Blessings on her, as her father gives her away. The marriage service is short, and the fateful binding vows are soon spoken. Husband and wife descend from the resplendent altitude of the wedding into the commonplace happy valley of everyday life. Roseate clouds of the honeymoon drift around their pathway; but these soon disappear, and the two, before many weeks will take up their duties and begin to share their responsibilities as wedded pairs have done for ages.

Perhaps they anticipate unalloyed bliss from the very start. If so, they will probably be doomed to some disappointment. A twelvemonth will hardly be too much time for James to grow acquainted with Sophy, and for Sophy to learn the ways of the real James. There are a thousand subtle adjustments which must come before the newly wedded are perfectly sure that they will never jar upon one another, that they will always be in harmony. That they shall forever be in unbroken agreement, is not to be hoped for nor desired. There may be entire responsiveness and sympathy, where also there is variety of opinion and difference of conclusion on subjects not vital. In essentials, it is needful that married people be at one. A devout woman united to a scoffer, a reverential man married to an unbelieving woman, can have little chance for happiness.

If people are to be good comrades on the road, they must bear and forbear. Each must care primarily for the other's welfare. The one who is socially inclined, must be willing to sit quietly by the fireside now and then; the one who loves domestic privacy must cheerfully go to the gay company and the festive scene. Mutual respect is a good firm foundation for married success, the sort of success which means an uninterrupted confidence and a growing regard, through the whole journey of life. The household that is built on a basic rock of entire honesty, will endure when one that rises from the shifting sands of deceit has fallen into utter wreck.

Notwithstanding occasional complaints on the part of pessimistic observers, most marriages are happy. The brides of the season will as a rule step forward into a lifetime of usefulness, of service, of self-respect. All over our broad land, the lamps shine night by night in sweet and safe and stable homes, where love reigns, children cluster about the table, men work bravely for daily bread, women lead gentle and peaceful lives, not wishing careers, and God is honored as Father, Creator, Preserver and Friend.

The Evening Frolic

A blithe, ringing step comes up the garden walk. A key turns in the latch. A cheery voice shouts "Hullo, the house!" A sweet face smiles from the upper landing, where the wife waits to greet her good man. There is a rush of pattering feet, pell-mell over hall and sitting-room and stairway. "Father has come home!" cry the children. One tugs with her dimpled hands at his coat; another, puts up a flower-like face for a kiss; a third, rummages in the pockets that are never empty, for some little treasure-trove from town.

Then father has a frolic with the bairns. They play hide-and-seek; they scamper up and down; there is no end of noise and joyful clamor for a cheery space of time, till the mother calls for quiet, and father himself

TO THE FIRST TRAILING ARBUTUS

O lovely pale pink arbutus, thou harbinger of Spring,
Thou hidest in thy leafy bower, while radiant bluebirds sing.
What rare, delicious fragrance is borne upon the breeze;
I love to stoop and gather thee, under the budding trees.

It makes me think of Springtime, in all its glorious bloom;
It makes me think of Jesus—He burst from Easter tomb.
—"LILIAN."

LONELY PEOPLE

I WANT to plead for the lonely people, the ones who are left out of the good times. In a certain village, there are, we will say, a number of young men and women who have been drawn thither by business positions. There are not enough of them to form a society of their own, and moreover, they are boarding, and away from their homes. In that village in the evening, when business hours are over, a good deal of social enjoyment goes on; but the residents are conservative, and also, they fall into cliques. They do not widen the circle to take in the new-comers, and the self-supporting. This is all wrong, very thoughtless and very narrow. That young stenographer, that teacher of the district school, that bookkeeper at the foundry, that dressmaker who has put out a modest sign, has a claim on you, who were in town before she or he came, and should be included in the pleasures and merry-makings, unless you are unchristian and therefore ill-bred and foolishly exclusive in your town.

Involuntary Wounds

I once knew a sweet little girl who had a great dread of hurting any one's feelings. She was more than careful, this dear child, of ever saying or doing the least thing that could possibly hurt or wound another. It would be well if we all felt equally the necessity of guarding our gestures, our looks and our speech, so that we should never give offense. A good deal of wounding goes on that is unintentional. People smile or frown at the mistakes of a child, or an old person, and straightway forget that they did so, while the one who was thus made aware of a blunder, quivers with resentful pain. We should aim to be self-controlled, even in our looks, so that we may never give a single needless pang to those who surround us. Above all, our care should be great in our relationship to servants, to children, to those who are in any degree dependent upon our tempers or our purses, that we never jar upon them, nor wound their sensibilities, nor inflict upon them the tyranny of our lower and more selfish moods.

Tell-Tale Lines

"I watched that pretty woman the whole evening, and I saw that she was cross and dissatisfied. There were tell-tale lines about her face that spoiled her beauty."

"Suffering lines maybe?"

"No, suffering writes one story, and ill-temper another. That woman is not a good-tempered person."

The fragment of conversation gave me a text.

Tell-tale lines are graven on our countenances by emotions which ravage and lay waste our souls. She who would be free from those marks of care and fretfulness which disfigure some middle-aged faces, must be neither care-worn nor fretful. We are the artists of our own faces, we, not outsiders, by the domination of our thoughts, change ourselves from one degree of grace to another, or mar the loveliness we might have. No fretful heart can fail to impress itself on a face that will proclaim fretfulness to all beholders.

EUGENIA M.

JUST A LITTLE TUNE

Here's Nelly sitting by herself, but never fear for Nell;
She's picking out a little tune, as you and I might spell.

And she's as happy all alone,
As if her divan were a throne.

goes away to prepare for the supper that smells so appetizing, as whiffs of good things come from the kitchen.

The home returning of some husbands is less pleasant than this. Men are often too discouraged or too weary to frolic with their babies at night. Some men are too grumpy, too fault-finding, to be pleasant company at home. God pity them and their wives. For in this short life, the best that any of us can hope for is that we may have work to do, and do it well and bravely, and home to rest in when the day's work is done. Our home should see the sunny side of our soul, not the stormy and frowning side. "The merry heart goes all the way. The sad one tires in a mile—ah!"

Two Little Friends

The friends are four-footed creatures, born to be foes, but they have been brought up together, and Puss is not contented unless Fido shares her bed at night. When, lately, little Tom was angry at his sister and gave her a push, Mary exclaimed, "For shame, brother! You are not as polite as Fido is to Pussy."

GEMS FROM THE WORLD'S GREAT PULPITS

Living Thoughts from the Recent Sermons of Eminent Preachers of Many Denominations

TO EVERY MAN HIS WORK

REV. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, FOURTH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, N. Y.

AN apostle was one who was to testify to the resurrection of Christ because he had with his own eyes seen him. Naturally, this office has ceased with the death of the last one of the apostles who had looked upon his risen Lord. A prophet was one who was to tell of things to come. But since the revelation of God in his Word has been completed and the canon closed, of necessity this office, too, has become inoperative. But there is no evidence that any of three remaining offices has been withdrawn; to the contrary, God has ever and again so set his seal upon them that we are sure of his judgment concerning them. The offices are described by the words themselves. An evangelist is a herald or proclaimer of good tidings; a pastor is a shepherd whose business it is to care for the flock committed to his care; a teacher is an instructor who by his teaching builds up in the knowledge of God and of his will;—and together they are to work for "the perfecting of the saints, . . . for the edifying of the body of Christ." And the word "perfecting" means not only building up, but also keeping in place. This would properly be the work of a shepherd or pastor; while to edify means to instruct, and is accordingly the work of the teacher. We believe in the professional evangelist only in the same way that we believe in the professional pastor or teacher. He is one who is called of God to do a certain work, exhibits qualifications for that work, and has had the seal of approval both of God and man in his work.

LIFE ATTAINED

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, BALTIMORE, MD.

LIFE! Oh, how we want it! There is not a man or woman or child that does not want it. Life! Where is it? Death is everywhere. The air is choked with farewells to the dying. But I want life. O, Time! Ruthless, relentless; never bought off; never made to stop in the turning of his busy wheels; old Time rides everywhere, passing away; it is on your home to-day; it is on the faces of your friends; the silvered hair and the furrowed brow and the wrinkled cheek—all are the hieroglyphics which tell the same story; dying while we live. Oh, how I want life! I long for life! Listen: "Strive to enter in through the narrow door, for narrow is the door that leadeth unto life." There it is. Pass through that door, and you come to the vantage ground whence you look upon the perishing, passing things of to-day with perfect sense of victory over decay. Tell me I am dying, and I tell you, you have not yet begun to understand the secret of Christian life. I am not dying; I am living. "Ah, but the marks of decay are on you." I know they are on me, but presently through the veil of this flesh shall flash forth the Blessed Life. Presently I shall fall on sleep, the day's work done—may God grant it be well done—the toil over; and then to sleep in the poor earth, waking into the likeness of the Master. Life; blessed life, broad life, beautiful life. Whence came it? He, the thorn-crowned, brought it out of the deep, dense darkness of death. Can I have it? Yes. How? Strive to enter in.

TENDENCIES OF THE TIMES

WEALTH and worldliness unspruitualize hosts of professed Christians. The present artificial arrangements of society antagonize devotional meetings and special efforts to promote revivals. On Sabbath mornings many a minister has to shovel out scores of his congregation from under the drifts (not very clean snow, either) of the mammoth Sunday newspapers. The zealous pastor of to-day has to contend with a lowered popular faith in the authority of God's Word, a lowered reverence for God's day, and a diminishing habit of attending upon God's worship. Do these increasing difficulties demand a new Gospel? No; but rather a mightier faith in the one we have. Do they demand new doctrines? No; but more power in preaching the truths that have outlived nineteen centuries. Do we need a new revelation of Jesus Christ? Yes, yes, in the fuller manifestation of him in the more loving, courageous and consecrated lives of his followers. A new baptism of the Holy Spirit? Verily, we do need it; and then our pulpits will be clothed with power, and our preachers will have tongues of fire, and every change will be a change for the better advancement and enlargement of the kingdom of our adorable Lord.

RELENTLESS LAW

DR. W. M. STRYKER, HAMILTON COLLEGE, CLINTON, N. Y.

EVERY kind of law is on his side who keeps it and every kind of law is against him who breaks it. The law of gravity, of explosives, of health, of contract, of commerce, of art—these laws, heeded, become allies. To observe public morality finds public approval. And he who obeys God, has God's approval. All obedience, so far as such, works its appropriate results. There are no gratuitous or uncovenanted rewards, nor any accidental penalties. Mercy moves in its own orbit. Each side of tangible sin keeps its own boundaries. Inner forgiveness does not remit overt penalty. Restitution amends some offenses, but also some scars are worn to the grave. Rescue does not restore the external status. Therefore, a true repentance from evil as such does not stipulate the abatement of outward consequences. A drunkard reforms, his soul heals, but he, nevertheless, goes to an earlier grave. Human law touches little else save that which concerns man in his person and property; it has to leave the deepest moral vindication for the world to come. Both for warning and consolation, we are taught to look toward celestial justice as the intrinsic thing. The end is not here. Looking past relentless shocks of mechanism, past the grimly beautiful exactness of the physical order, looking on to God's moral disclosures of the ends which transcend mere force, we shall escape both a false confidence and a needless foreboding. By and by, hearing the upper parts, we shall catch the harmony that now is only figured with this mysterious bass. We shall know how even stress and pain could co-operate for good to them that loved God.

CHRIST AS A WORKING MAN

DR. DAVID J. BURRELL, MARBLE COLLEGIATE CHURCH, N. Y.

IT is frequently said that the Church of our time has lost its grip on the working class. The statement is far too sweeping; but whatever of truth it contains, is measured by the extent to which the Church, ever or anywhere, turns aside from the word or example of her Lord. He was no respecter of persons; his heart overflowed with love for all sorts and conditions of men. Jesus was a social reformer. As a man of the people, he had a heart that was in sympathy with them; and his life and teaching were addressed to the betterment of their conditions here and hereafter. It is now nineteen hundred years since his advent. The ripening of his glorious purpose has been slow but sure. "The mills of God grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small." We look back over the centuries and are able to estimate what Christ has done for the people. The heart of Jesus went out to the masses, to the great body of producers, who, by sweat of brain and brawn, are ever enriching the world. Observe how his preaching is enriched with industrial figures; of nets and boats, mentary gleam like the lightning; but it is like the sun and the dew, a regular and a constant blessing. Therefore, to go or to give to foreign missions, to missions in our own land; to try to bring back a Christian going astray in sin or apathy to righteousness and renewed life, or to convert some neighbor from idolatry to this world to the worship and service of the living God; to give a friendly invitation to a neglecter of public worship to come with you to church; to teach a class in Sunday School—all this is to have part in the missionary work committed by Christ to his apostles.

BIBLE POWER

DR. ROBERT STUART MACARTHUR, CALVARY BAPTIST CHURCH, NEW YORK

THE Bible illustrates the best elements of historical writing; and every page gives proof that its writers wrote in the conscious presence of the living God. Its biographies are matchless; this difficult species of writing is here seen to perfection. Truth dominates every part; infirmities and excellencies are faithfully portrayed. This fact is an evidence of its inspiration; uninspired writers would have denied or concealed the sins, and would have magnified or created the virtues of their heroes. Its influence on language is wonderful; it has fixed the form of our language; and it ennobles and exalts every language into which it is translated.

HOW TO BE HAPPY

DR. R. F. HORTON, CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, HAMPSTEAD, ENG.

REAL life lies in service; that is to say, to be of some use in the world, to make other people happier and better by our presence among them, is the only way of being happy and of improving ourselves, and that not as an occasional thing for a day or for a month, but as the settled habit of our life. I am here in this world to serve and to think of others and not of myself. Now, although that is the open secret of happiness in the world, it is extraordinarily difficult for us to realize it, and I suppose most young people begin under the impression that instead of happiness lying in service it lies in being served. I would therefore remind you, especially those of you who are placed in circumstances of ease and comfort, that if you make the great object of your life pleasure and amusement, the springs of your being will gradually dry up within you, and long before you have reached middle life you will find that pleasure has ceased to please and amusement has ceased to amuse; but, on the other hand, if you make the whole object of your life to serve others, to minister, to bless, and to save any of these human beings around you, you will find that those sacred springs within your own nature bubble up afresh, bubble up in perennial freshness, and while you never sought you will always find pleasure and amusement in the world.

ADJOURNED MYSTERIES

DR. B. D. THOMAS, BAPTIST CHURCH, TORONTO

YOUR supreme business is not to know, but to do. It is not for the workmen who are engaged in the construction of a magnificent pile, which is to be the wonder and admiration of the ages, to have a clear knowledge of the architectural ideal. All they need know is how to use the tools that have been placed in their hands; all they need be anxious about is the particular piece of wall given them to build. They labor necessarily in the dark. All they need be assured of is that they are working under the guidance and inspiration of the great Master-BUILDER. Be true, be honest, be diligent, be faithful, fill the particular position into which Providence hath introduced you as well as it can be filled by the grace of God, and the great Architect under whose superintendence the vast structure is being upreared will take care of the congruities and harmonies. Do not agitate yourself with questions which are beyond your capacity to understand. Do not permit the inexplicable and the perplexing in human phenomena to disquiet you. Do not obtrude into the domain of the Infinite. Do thou thy work. The mysteries and the incongruities, the anomalies and the perplexities, are not for thee to decipher and understand. "Go thou thy way till the end be."

RECOMPENSE OF REWARD

DR. T. B. M'LEOD, CLINTON AVENUE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

A MAN is not good who strives to be good for the sake of reward. A man is not truthful who simply speaks the truth because of some future advantage which he may enjoy. A student is no real student who studies in order that he may secure social promotion by and by, but who does not love knowledge for its own sake. A religious man is in no true sense religious who is religious for the sake of reward. "Virtue is its own reward." Can you imagine the Prodigal Son, after his return home to his father's house, fixing his eye on his father's acres or on his father's fatted calves and regarding these things among the assets which he would like to inherit by and by as a reward of his repentance and return to right living? No, but just to be home again; to be in his father's embrace once more. Just to hear the word of forgiveness; to feel the current of new life pulsating in his veins—that was enough for him. The apostle Paul said: "I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." What was that? That was not reward to be paid to him for services, or sacrifice, or piety. It was perfection he was aiming at, and that was enough for him. Those to whom Christ promised houses and lands and a hundredfold more in this present life—they were not deceived by the promise. How little they ever had; how much they suffered; how much they had to sacrifice, and yet that promise had its realization even in this earthly life. I may not get a hundred times more than I own now, but if I am a true disciple I shall get a hundred times more capacity to enjoy what I now possess.

REV. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D.

Pastor of Fourth Presbyterian Church, New York

sowing, fertilizing and reaping, mills and markets and toll-booths, shepherds, housekeepers, architects, vinedressers and other sorts of handicraftsmen. At the outset of his ministry he gathered about him a cabinet of twelve men, all of whom were devoted to braincraft or handicraft. There was not among them a single gentleman of leisure. In view of such conditions, it is not surprising to learn that the great multitude of believers in the early church were from among the working class. On the one hand, "not many mighty, not many noble were called;" and on the other, there was little in the new religion to attract the indolent, since one of its fundamental precepts was, "If any man will not work, neither let him eat."

WORK FOR ALL

DR. SYLVESTER CLARKE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

HOW can the duty of evangelizing the world be carried out? How can each help in fulfilling the command? In answering these questions it must be remembered that the command rests upon the whole Church. The whole Church fulfils the command, each one doing what he can. Some go to distant lands; others furnish the means by which they go. The Church is a body, and all the members have not the same office. Moreover, the whole work of the Church is included under the command, and that work is not simply to make a world-wide outline, but also to fill up that outline. This divine missionary society is not a mere herald passing through the lands with a proclamation, coming a stranger and departing a stranger, but where it comes it remains a patient teacher and friend. It does not rush along like a prairie fire, with a fierce but passing heat, or flash with a mo-

BUSY TIMES AT OUR CHILDREN'S HOME

SUMMER, when we "welcome our children home," is near at hand, and these are days of bustling activities at Mont-Lawn. Carpenters are working away at the new Lodge and the new cottage—the Tibbals Memorial. Gardeners and farm-hands are plowing and hoeing and putting seeds into the ground, which will later bring forth vegetables for over two thousand hungry little mouths. A large family that! Housemother Collins and her assistants are overhauling everything, and the place will be "clean and sweet as roses" from top to bottom, when opening day comes, and with it stage-loads of joyous guests. Greening hillsides, budding flowers, nest-building birds, scampering squirrels seem waiting for our children to come and be happy at home. Meanwhile, letters from pastors, mission workers, Sunday School teachers, and others who labor among tenement waifs pour in upon us, asking if we will have room for their little charges this summer. The following extracts are typical of many letters received:

JERRY AND HIS "BABY"

Rev. Dr. Sanford, Superintendent Five Points Mission: "We are under obligations to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home for reception and care of hundreds of our little ones, many of whom never enjoyed the luxury of a comfortable bed before or three meals a day. I hope for enlargement of your work of faith and love in bringing some happiness into young lives which have held too much sadness."—Miss Kitching, Missionary of the Female Auxiliary Bible Society: "Can you take more children from us this summer? I gratefully acknowledge the great help you have rendered me in my work as missionary. Forty poor children in my district enjoyed the hospitality of your summer home last season; all returned happy, fat and well. Such a beautiful place it is! Too much can not be said in praise of this work. The children one and all had such a good time, with plenty to eat of wholesome food. Our only trouble now is that they are asking on every side: 'Please, when can I go to Mont-Lawn?'"

Rev. John Acworth, Assistant Pastor of Church of the Beloved Disciple: "The children you so kindly took from our parish last year came back much improved in health, and so grateful for kindnesses received. I trust the generosity of the children's friends—the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—will make it possible for you to continue your good work to us this summer."

Francis H. White, General Secretary Brooklyn Children's Aid Society, says: "Our applications for outings are much in excess of supply of homes. Brooklyn is growing rapidly and we should have more country places instead of fewer to which we can send children, but the reverse is the case; no doubt the pressure is very great in Manhattan, also. I apply to you in behalf of the many children in Brooklyn, who are greatly in need of an outing to allow us to send some of them to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home this summer."

From social and religious Settlements come reminders:

Mrs. M. K. Simkhovitch, Headworker Friendly Aid Settlement. "You were kind enough last summer to take a generous number of our children to your Fresh Air Home. May we hope for the same favor this season?"—Miss Harriet Irwin, Headworker Gospel Settlement. "The Gospel Settlement earnestly thanks THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for its generous kindness in the matter of outings. We sent forty-one children to Mont-Lawn last summer, and we trust you can take as many from us during the season at hand."

Superintendent Devare, Abigail Free School and Kindergarten, Sullivan street, (foreign quarter) writes:

Keep are the expectations of our little ones for invitation to visit at Mont-Lawn. Their experience at your Home is an event in their lives, and its results for good are indelible. They come back with the idea that their poverty, humble position, etc., act as no bar to unrestricted enjoyment of good things beyond their dreams; they are courteously and kindly treated—are looked upon as little American brothers and sisters. They learn, too, that the God worshiped at Mont-Lawn is their Common Father and that they are included with their teachers and attendants as his children. That is what hundreds of children of the Abigail School have told us—for we get their confidence after a stay at Mont-Lawn more readily than before. Mont-Lawn is our ideal of a Children's home—so fresh and sweet it is, so free from all selfish and worldly influences. I hope you will this year draw, as usual, upon our almost unlimited number of children and give them the ten days' outing of which they stand so sadly in need.

Jerry and his sister are types of the children who appeal on their own account. They looked so hungry that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent them to a dairy for cups of milk. Jerry would not touch his till "baby" was satisfied; and the love of the little ragged creatures toward each other drew all eyes upon them. A gentleman gave Jerry five cents; returning a grateful glance, Jerry dropped the nickel in the baby's palm. Good garments have been given the pair. Will you help us send such as these to Mont-Lawn for a little happy time next season? Children of the stifling tenements suffer so when hot days come; and so many of them die. Only $3 will give, what to many a waif is a chance for its life—a ten days' outing at Mont-Lawn; that small sum covering cost of transportation back and forth, food, shelter, medical and caretakers' attention, etc.; $6 sends two; $9 three; $12 four; $24 makes eight little folks happy; $30 sends ten; $21 supports a cot for ten weeks. Send cash contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. Garments your children have outgrown will be welcome; and these should be shipped to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

Saved from Cannibals.

Reverend John G. Paton, "Apostle to the Hebrides," has again narrowly escaped a frightful death at the hands of the Cannibals. As readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are aware, this brave and venerable servant of God has endured many perils in carrying the Gospel to those islands, where none before him had succeeded. The story of the present trouble is thoroughly in keeping with his past. In a fight which took place in the bush near the village of Tanna, both tribes warring with spears and knives, fifty-one natives were left on the field dead, and a large number of wounded were carried off by each party for a feast. Mr. Paton went on the field where the two tribes were fighting and attended the wounded at the risk of his life. While bending over two wounded natives, one a woman, spears were hurled at him by the attacking tribe, but, in God's providence, none struck him. He, however, was driven from the field, and forced to seek refuge at Tanna. This account was brought from the islands by the steamer Mambore, which recently arrived at Victoria, B. C. Her passengers had found a big cannibalistic feast in progress at Tanna when the boat touched there, a company of natives being engaged in devouring a great number of unfortunate prisoners. That Dr. Paton was not among the latter is little short of a miracle, judging from statements given. The steamer Moand also reports details of terrible tribal wars and fearful feasting in the islands, together with earthquakes, tidal waves and other grave happenings.

Chapter XXVI.

A Glittering Temptation

HILDA WILDE went home to her father's house the next day, and young Rossi betook himself to the city, where, it may well be imagined, a mass of accumulated business awaited his attention. He devoted himself to his task with a light heart, which betrayed itself in tokens many.

"You are looking exceedingly well, my dear Mr. Rossi," observed Mr. Smalley, with almost paternal interest. "I am told that you passed some weeks in Newport early in the season. We—ah, regret that you did not see fit to establish yourself there. But perhaps"—Mr. Smalley paused and coughed behind his hand. It hardly seemed possible to him that his client could have met with a refusal at the hands of Miss Livingstone; yet she was a high-bred girl, and young Rossi was, after all, nouveau riche, and possi-

"Ah, indeed; very romantic and interesting, I am sure," said Mr. Smalley politely. "The young lady is to be congratulated—er, yes, certainly. And what, may I ask, are your plans for the future? You will hardly continue your present style of living after your marriage—eh? There is that Fifth avenue property still to be had, I am told, and at a very reasonable figure."

"I propose to repair and refurnish my uncle's farm-house; we shall live there, at any rate, for some time."

"Hum—ah; and will the young lady be satisfied with your plans for her future, do you think?"

"She loves me," said Immanuel simply.

The lawyer shrugged his shoulders. "Ah, well, you will of course do as you choose," he said dryly. "You may, however, think differently later on. The young lady herself may have views of life which—er—may tend to modify—yes, to—bly stubborn and maladroit in his love making as in his investments.

"I'm going to be married," said the young man bluntly.

"Ah, indeed! Well, well," cried the lawyer. "I congratulate you; I do, indeed, my dear sir! But your announcement is—er—not wholly unexpected. I may say that your choice has fallen upon a young lady of the most unexceptional connections; you could not, in short, have done better. I am delighted."

"You do not know the young lady I hope to make my wife," said Immanuel coolly. "I agree with you entirely, though. I deserve to be congratulated. I could not have done better."

"May I ask, is it permissible to inquire who the fortunate young woman is?" asked Mr. Smalley with some perturbation. "I beg your pardon, I am sure. There were rumors, you know."

"I am to marry Miss Hilda Wilde in the autumn," said Immanuel, fixing his eyes on the old lawyer's dismayed face. "She is a poor girl; she believes I am a poor farmer. I do not intend to deceive her for the present."

ah—modify your somewhat extreme ideas."

"You do not know her, sir," said Immanuel, with some heat.

"I have not the pleasure, to be sure," admitted Mr. Smalley, with laborious politeness; "but if I may be allowed, I would say that—" He stopped short and tightened his thin lips. He was about to suggest from the depths of his own experience, that possibly his client might chance upon unexplored territory in his wife's character in the course of his matrimonial journeyings; but he refrained. "He'll find it out soon enough, poor wretch," he said to himself, after the young gentleman had taken his leave.

Miss Hilda Wilde passed some very enjoyable days after her return to the paternal roof. For one thing, there were numerous confidential conversations with Miss Amelia Hurd, in the course of which she displayed an astonishing knowledge of Immanuel Rossi's character. "He is the most serious person in the world, 'Melie,'" she said impressively; "he looks at everything in a different way from anyone else."

Sometimes I think it is just the least bit tiresome; or it would be if he was not so handsome and so perfectly fascinating."

Miss Hurd was a tall, ungainly young woman, with thin hair of no particular color, a rough skin, and pale greenish eyes. She regarded Hilda with a feeling which was uncertainly compounded of envy and warm admiration. Having no lovers of her own, she had attached herself with ardor to the heart fortunes of her friend, and alternately thrilled and chilled at the capricious will of the beauty like the mercury in the tube of a thermometer. "My, I wish I could see him!" she murmured. "Have n't you got his photo, Hil?"

"No, I haven't," said Hilda, with a yawn. "I guess I can endure it, though, till I see him." She looked down reflectively at her small hands. "I wonder if he'll buy me an engagement ring?"

"Of course he will!" cried Miss Hurd. "I do hope it'll be a di'mon'. Wouldn't that be elegant. But perhaps he can't afford it; di'mon's are awfully expensive." "I don't believe he'll ever think of such a thing," said Hilda, pouting. "He doesn't seem to notice clothes—or anything like that. All he cares about is just books and—well, yes, I guess he does care some about me."

"Plenty of other folks do, too," said Miss Hurd, nodding and blinking mysteriously. "I saw Jack Snider yesterday, and I told him you'd come home. He—"

"Oh, 'Melia," interrupted Hilda, with an anxious pucker of her white forehead, "I do hope you didn't say anything to Jack about him. I don't want anybody to know—not anybody."

"Why not?" inquired Miss Hurd, with a jerk of her angular elbows.

"I don't know," said Hilda, reflectively. "He—he's different. What did Jack say?"

"He's coming to see you. And, oh, Hil, what do you think; his uncle's took him into the business and he's making lots of money."

That same evening, Miss Wilde entertained Mr. Snider in the parlor, after the approved fashion of the country side; that is to say, the door into the sitting-room, where her father was dozing over his weekly paper, was tightly closed, and the dun-colored window shades were closely drawn. The two young people sat on opposite sides of the room; Hilda, as usual, drooping her pretty face over some intricate embroidery, the young man sitting bolt upright, apparently absorbed in painful consciousness of his abnormally high shirt-collar, above which his solemn round face appeared like the knob of a cane.

Mr. Snider had very black hair, plastered down in oily curves on either side of a bulging forehead; his black eyes and his black moustache pleasantly diversified a countenance otherwise monotonously red and white. He gazed at his self-possessed hostess with obvious anxiety, "I s'pose you had an awful good time up o your uncle's," he said, clearing his throat, and throwing one leg over the other in a futile attempt to appear at elegant ease.

"Yes, indeed," cooed Hilda, turning her pretty head so as to bring into view a smartly-tied bow of blue ribbon. "It was awfully lonesome up there," she added, with a reminiscent smile.

"Was it?" said Mr. Snider, joyously. "Well, you're home now, anyway. I guess we'll be having some pretty gay times here this fall," he added, after a pause.

"I don't know as I shall be here all the fall," said Hilda, meditatively. The pink deepened deliciously in her round cheeks. "Maybe I'll be going away again in—October."

"Did Melia Hurd tell you I'd gone into business with Uncle John?"—after a long silence, in which he shifted uneasily in his chair.

"Yes," said Hilda, smiling with a pretty how of friendly interest. "How very nice for you, Jack." She pronounced the last word with just the sweetest little air of reserve.

"Oh, Hilda," breathed the young man, "I want to tell you; I'm making most a thousand dollars a year, an' Uncle John's awful good to me. He says if I should want to build a new house this fall he'd give me a nice lot off his side-yard. There ain't a prettier place in town."

Hilda looked up, her blue eyes full of interest. "Are you going to build a new house?" she asked. "How lovely."

"I—I'm never going to build it, Hilda, unless you'll promise to live in it with me when it's done. Say, you don't know how awfully sweet you are, Hilda. I—I love you so I can't tell you."

Hilda made no reply. She was thinking of the shabby little house on the back hill-road. Even with ruffled muslin curtains and a coat of new paint, it would hardly compare with a new house on the main street of the village.

The young man's words fairly tumbled over one another. He had risen from his chair and was stooping over the little figure in the rocking-chair. "Hilda," he whispered, imploringly, "won't you say yes?"

"Please sit down, Jack," said the girl composedly. "I can't think when you worry me so." Her calm, bright eyes rested curiously on the flushed countenance above the high collar. It was certainly "different" from the grave face, alight with incomprehensible emotion, which had bent toward her for the last time under the shade of the hickories on the back hill-road. She had received a letter in the evening mail; it was in her pocket at this very moment. She had found it, like the writer's conversation, just the least bit tiresome.

"Aren't you going to answer me, Hilda?" "I can't—to-night," she said rather crossly. "I—I must think. It is such a serious thing to get married, Jack," she added, with sweet seriousness.

"Oh, Hilda, you have always known me, and that I cared for nobody but you! Couldn't you—"

"Not to-night. I must have time to think it over."

"Well, I want to tell you one thing, Hilda—though of course it won't make any difference in what you think of me. But your father might like me better even if you didn't care. Uncle John has nobody but me since Aunt Sarah died, and he is going to leave me all his money. I guess it's as much as ten thousand dollars."

"Ten thousand dollars!" repeated Hilda, opening her blue eyes to their widest. "Why, you'll be rich, Jack."

"I'll be poorer 'an Job's turkey if I don't get you," affirmed Mr. Snider, with a beseeching look. "I don't care a bit for money except to buy pretty things for you." His voice fell to a whisper. "Say, I've been saving up ever so long to buy you a ring, Hilda. I was most sure you'd say yes. If you won't get mad I'll show it to you."

Mr. Snider produced a light-blue satin case from his waistcoat pocket and proffered it with a furious blush. "I wisht you'd let me fit it on your dear little finger, Hilda," he whispered huskily.

"Why, it's a diamond!" exclaimed the girl. "Why, Jack Snider, what a beauty! Where did you get it?"

"I was down to Noo York whilst you was gone; I got it there. Do you like it? Will you wear it? Don't you like me just a little, dear?"

Hilda was turning the glittering thing from side to side; she seemed fascinated with the scarlet and azure fires that shot out from the small white stone in its rather showy setting. "It's perfectly lovely, Jack," she said at last in a low voice. "And to think you bought it for me; it must have cost a lot of money."

"I paid a hundred dollars for it," said Mr. Snider proudly; "but that's only a patch on what I'll do for you if you'll only have me, Hilda."

The girl thrust the ring into its white satin nest with trembling fingers. "I—I—can't tell you to-night, Jack," she said piteously. "I—I am not—I must think, and—please go away now."

AN APRIL BRACER.

Grape-Nuts Food Gives Spring in the Spring.

Teachers require nourishing food more than the average person, for their work is nerve destroying, and unless the food taken will surely rebuild the lost gray matter nervous prostration will set in.

A lady teacher writes, "For the benefit of fellow teachers and all brain workers who expend daily an amount of nerve energy I want to tell just what I know personally about Grape-Nuts Breakfast Food."

When I was teaching in a boarding school at P— in '98 one of the day teachers ate Grape-Nuts regularly for breakfast and supper and appeared so well and strong in all her work.

Miss R— used to beg me to join her and give the food a trial but for some reason I never would try it until the spring of the present year. Then one day in April when I was very much in need of something bracing and was on the point of buying the usual tonic, she prevailed on me to begin using Grape-Nuts. So we ate Grape-Nuts together from then until June.

Previous to that, every spring I had been compelled to take bottle after bottle of tonics and then go home much run down, but this year June found me well and strong after a most trying month of work, with never a thought about tonics other than the nourishment received from Grape-Nuts. Naturally I believe heartily in the merits of the food.

Since leaving that boarding school, I learn that nearly every teacher in the school from the principal down uses Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Gospel Tent Work Spreads

Many Cities Following Philadelphia's Example for a Summer Gospel Campaign

DURING the past three years, a movement has been inaugurated and carried forward with great success in Philadelphia, in relation to the organization of evangelistic services and the spread of the Gospel during the summer months, by means of open-air gatherings and meetings held in tents in various parts of the city. So successful was this movement, that other cities inaugurated a similar work which met with a large degree of success.

The Presbyterian General Assembly, last spring, appointed a special Evangelistic Committee to encourage the spread of the work, especially in the great cities of the Union. The Rev. James B. Ely, as representative of the Committee, recently visited a number of Western cities and reports a strong sentiment in favor of the work.

The Cleveland Presbytery has recommended it, and ministers there are planning to preach in the open air. Similar work is being planned in Toledo. Chicago is contemplating a general union movement. Mr. Ely met with a committee of twenty-five, representing five different denominations, appointed to confer together as to the best and most practical plans of organization. The plan is to have a union movement, in which each denomination will bear its own share of the financial burden, and co-operate in the organization of workers. The Presbyterians in Chicago contemplate the erection of at least three tents, and the movement has taken such a firm hold on the workers of the Church, that they may be able to have five or six tents.

In St. Louis, the Presbyterians have indicated their intention to the Rev. S. J.

Niccolls, D. D., of having at least five or six tents. Other denominations are considering plans, and a committee has been appointed representing all the churches, looking toward a union movement. They will formulate plans for evangelistic work during the coming World's Fair in St. Louis. The latter city has just experienced a remarkable quickening of interest among the Christian workers, through the meetings recently held by the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. Some of the pastors expressed the belief that the city had not been so generally aroused and the Churches so much united since Mr. Moody's work there.

In Indianapolis, the General Assembly's representative conferred with a number of business men, who held a special meeting, and it was the unanimous sentiment that steps should be taken for presenting the subject to all the leading churches, to enlist their sympathy and active co-operation. Committees have been appointed by the Allegheny and Pittsburg Presbyteries for the organization of some form of evangelistic work, and they are arranging for a union meeting of the committees. In all the plans looking to the extension of this work, it has been the settled purpose of the General Assembly's Committee to co-operate with any movement of a similar character, and to do everything in their power to add to its efficiency. If the names of one thousand ministers could be secured who have already determined upon some such work, who may be inspired to undertake it during the coming season, it would be a wonderful stimulus to the Church throughout the entire country.

their live cattle on the ranches, and drive them to the agencies to be slaughtered as needed.

The cost of subsistence supplies for the Indians in a single year, as given in the Indian Commissioner's report for the fiscal year ending June 1, 1900, was $1,231,000, of which $135,432.91 was expended in transportation alone. The total cost to the Government of caring for its Indian wards exceeds $10,000,000 yearly. According to the United States Treasury compilation, the total expenditure on account of the Indian service from March 4, 1789, up to and including June 30, 1901, was $368,358,217.17.

Arrived at the reservations, the Government supplies are dealt to the Indians according to their needs or as agreed upon by treaty. Of the 267,000 Indians in the United States, 45,270 receive a daily ration. There are about 12,000 others to whom food is dealt out in some form by the Government. These figures do not include the Indian Police, or the boys and girls at Indian boarding-schools. The rations are issued twice a month, the quantity issued being based upon the daily allowance for each individual. Issues are made to the heads of families, every member of the family being counted, even to the smallest infant, except children at boarding-schools. On the issue days, the Indians, with their families, gather at the agency to receive their rations. They come with wagons and pack animals from their homes on the reservation, some of them having to occupy several days coming and going.

As to the Government supplies other than subsistence they are distributed to the various agencies, which cover a field that extend from the Missouri River to the Pacific, from the Rio Grande to the Canadian border. At the day and boarding-schools are heard the click of sewing-machines, the voice of song and recitation, and the hum of Indian youths and children busily conning their lessons. The school furniture is of the most modern type, the attire of the scholars neat and becoming. That inferior material for the children's clothing is not tolerated, is shown in the advertisement for bids for gingham (the dress fabric for summer wear among the girl pupils), which expressly states: "Staple and fancy dress patterns desired. No unsalable or bad styles." The scholars at the boarding-schools are provided with all the toilet appliances usual for white children.

As for the progress in civilization of the Indians of mature age, the great quantity and variety of domestic utensils and industrial implements sent out to the agencies is sufficient comment. But, not all at once, can the sometime wearer of the gaudy blanket and war-paint fall into the ways of his white brother, and understand fully the uses of the tools and other appliances provided for him. At the Omaha warehouse, only a few months ago, a requisition was received from the Sioux Indian reservation for a large number of plows. It was duly honored, but as it was the second request for plows received within a short time, the superintendent sent an inspector to the reservation to make investigation. He found that the agent there had expatiated to the Indians on the advantages of irrigation for the raising of crops, to such effect, that they had prepared a large area of ground for cultivation by this method, using for the purpose the plows sent under the first requisition, as was proper to do. The inspector could find nothing of the plows sent under the second order, until the Indians showed him the dam that they had built across a stream in order to obtain the water required for their irrigation scheme. To give the structure stability, it had been found necessary to ballast it—and there, for that purpose, under water at the back of the dam, was ranged the entire shipment of plows sent out under the second order. To this day the Indians cannot quite understand why the inspector should have compelled them to weaken their dam, by taking out of the water behind it, a lot of badly rusted plows that were serving so excellent a purpose where they were. CLARENCE PULLEN.

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Over $70,000 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers in the last few years.

SAPOLIO

INSIDE THE GROCERY.

Some Facts Made Known.

It is often thought that grocers really have very little care regarding the food value of the articles they sell, but the real facts are that grocery keepers of the right sort are extremely particular as to what they recommend. One of the fraternity relates a tale. "The highest priced coffee on the market I introduced to my customers and used myself. I began to have bilious attacks and after a little observation attributed them directly to coffee. Every time I left off drinking it I got better, but I felt the need of a warm drink for breakfast.

Along in '96 a wholesale grocer urged me to put in some Postum Food Coffee in my store, which I did with considerable misgiving, for, at that time the now famous Postum was not so well known.

He urged me to try it myself, which I did and was disgusted with the flat, tasteless beverage, so was my wife. I remembered the wholesale grocer said something about following directions carefully, so I took the package and studied it. I at once discovered that we had not boiled it long enough, only three or four minutes, but it must be boiled 15 minutes at least, so we tried it again, with the result that we got a perfect cup of coffee, a delightful and healthful beverage. I have continued the use of Postum in my home ever since. We use it for breakfast, dinner and supper.

My bilious attacks quickly left me and I am free from them altogether. I began to explain to my customers something of the value of Postum Coffee and now have a very large trade on it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

PAUL'S FIRST SERMON

Salvation Rejected by the Jews is Offered to the Gentiles

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE first discourse of Paul which is on record, was delivered at Antioch, in Pisidia. Paul, with his two companions, had sailed from Paphos, in Cyprus, to Perga, in Pamphylia, on the south coast of Asia Minor, and to Antioch, and "they went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day," and waited to see how the Lord would open their way. After the usual reading of the Scripture, they were invited to give "any word of exhortation" they might have "for the people." The way being thus made, "Paul stood up, and beckoning with the hand," addressed the assembled company of colonial Jews and religious proselytes from among the Gentiles, as "Men of Israel, and ye that fear God." Peter, speaking to the multitude in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, had addressed them as, "Men of Judea, and all that dwell in Jerusalem." The appeal of each was to the Jew first, on the ground that the Scriptures which they believed, were fulfilled in the death and resurrection of Christ, whom they had crucified.

But the last and final rejection of the Holy Spirit, who had testified through Stephen, had put the nation of Israel, as a nation, into the same position as Esau, who had despised his birthright, and who "found no place of repentance" (Heb. 12: 17). Individual Jews might believe, and come into the blessing of eternal life; but the offer to the Jews of the kingdom under the rule of the Son of David was postponed until Christ's coming again. Thus Paul did not as Peter did, urge the Jews as a nation to repent, "that times of refreshing might come from the presence of the Lord, and that he might send the Christ" (Acts 3: 19, 20). He did not announce that God had made Jesus of Nazareth, whom they had crucified, "both Lord and Christ," "Prince and Saviour, to give repentance unto Israel" (Acts 2: 36; 3: 31); he preached "a Saviour, Jesus," and said to Jew and proselyte, "To us is the word of this salvation sent forth."

"Be it known unto you, therefore, brethren, that through this Man is proclaimed unto you remission of sins; and by Him everyone that believeth is justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses." But such an announcement entails grave responsibilities. Paul does not speak his own words, but brings Scripture to bear on his audience: "Beware, therefore, lest that come upon you which is spoken in the prophets. Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish, for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in no wise believe, if one declare it unto you" (see Hab. 1: 5). An impression was made, and the congregation "besought that these words might be spoken to them the next Sabbath." But there were some who were smitten to the heart; they could not wait a whole week until the matter should be settled for them. "Many of the Jews and of the devout proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas." To them the word had come home, and they had understood it, so that their teachers had not to point them to Christ; they had believed, and only needed to be urged "to continue in the grace of God." It is a blessed thing when souls are thus brought to the Lord by an instant and full acceptance of his salvation, without any intervention of man: such are generally honest, upright souls, made ready beforehand.

"The next Sabbath almost the whole city was gathered together to hear the Word of God." During the ensuing week how many things may have happened. It is evident that a great move had taken place in the minds of the people. But the Jews who had besought them to speak had not reckoned on the intense hunger of the hearts of men for a real personal acquaintance with God, and with sin forgiven. These strangers had suddenly become popular; their own popularity would decline, and a spirit of jealousy took possession of them, so that "they contradicted the things which were spoken by Paul, and blasphemed." God overruled this to show Paul that he was called to be the Apostle to the Gentiles.

7 PER CENT

Cumulative Preferred Stock
Ten Dollars per Share

The Lackawanna Warehouse Company, incorporated under the laws of New Jersey (Authorized Capital $125,000.00) offers for subscription a limited number of shares of its Seven Per Cent Preferred Stock at par of $10.00 per share, interest payable quarterly, beginning July 1, 1902, and redeemable at any interest period after January 1, 1910.

The Company is a large owner of Real Estate at the terminus of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad at Hoboken, where it has ample track and switching facilities in connection with its extensive warehouse. The holders of the Preferred Stock are secured and guaranteed in their payments of income and principal by the real estate, assets and business of the Company, and are further secured by having the stock registered with the Registrar of the Company, The Atlantic Trust Company of New York.

The Lackawanna Warehouse Company conducts a profitable business of storing merchandise and of making advances of money upon staple marketable commodities stored in its own and other warehouses.

In addition to income from the storage of goods, a very attractive profit is assured from interest on loans, advances, insurance and sales, and it is felt this part of the business can be largely increased.

The Lackawanna Warehouse Company is conducted in a careful and conservative manner by capable men who have been engaged in this line for a number of years, and in whom the stockholders may have the greatest confidence. The stock offers, therefore, a more than ordinary security to those of moderate means who seek a safe and legitimate investment. We invite the fullest investigation. MISSIONS*

Individual Responsibility for the Support and Extension of Foreign Missionary Effort :

SURER than any other test of a church's condition, is that of its interest in foreign missions. Church attendance is a test, the prayer-meeting is a test, but the most reliable thermometer is that of the missionary contribution. It shows to what extent the church has the spirit of Christ, and is like him in his concern for the redemption of the world. It shows, too, to what extent it believes in the Gospel as the remedy for all human ill. When a man is sorry for the people who are living in ignorance of God and of the Gospel, and is so confident that Christianity would save them for this world and the next, that he will deny himself that he may aid in sending messengers of the Cross to them, there is strong ground for believing that faith and love are dominant in his soul, and that he is a genuine Christian. It is a test, also, of loyalty and obedience, for Christ's parting words, impressive as last words must ever be, were a command to disciple all nations. There is much work to be done at home, for unhappily our domestic heathen are very numerous, but it is on the frontiers that our hopes and ambitions are fixed, and we cannot and ought not to rest until they have been pushed farther forward, and the standard of the Cross has been raised in every land, and every race has had the opportunity of accepting the redemption which Christ died to place within the reach of the whole world.

The triumphs already won by the missionaries who have gone out to heathen lands, are large enough to encourage us to further effort. Critics have been eloquent in disparaging the results of missionary labor, and have shown by dividing the amount expended by the number of converts, how much money it has cost on the average to add one soul to the list of Christians in heathen lands; but, considering how stupendous was the task, it is marvelous that so much has been done. There are now nearly two million avowed Christians in heathendom and over seventy thousand native teachers are engaged in Gospel work. How many others there have been who have died in faith, we know not, but the living are a mighty host of trophies that attest the value and efficacy of the work. The missionaries had to contend with the prejudices of heredity, with the natural love of the people for their national faiths, with the opposition of societies and governments which terrorized men who were convinced of the truth but were held back from confessing it by the dread of persecution and social ostracism, and with the difficulties of acquiring barbarous languages in which to make themselves understood. Little more than a hundred years have elapsed since Christian men set themselves seriously to grapple with these problems, yet in that time how many have been won! The hardest work of the pioneers has been done, many a life has been sacrificed in the cause, and the fruits of work and sacrifice are yet to be garnered, but how rich have been the firstfruits! The future is now bright with hope of yet greater triumphs.

That the church should give itself earnestly and intelligently to this service there can be no doubt, but we ought not to seek to escape responsibility by that general term. Every Christian should feel individual responsibility. The most urgent need at present is for money. The Missionary Boards lack funds more than they do men. Happily the men are volunteering for service in large numbers, and if the funds, too, were available in like proportion, there would be hope of speedy fulfillment of the ideal of a whole world gospelized. This fact simplifies the problem. It reduces it to a question of consecration. What part of his possessions is each Christian willing to devote? What part of his income is he willing to give regularly to be used in obeying his Lord's command? Who is there who will go out among his friends and acquaintances to get money, inspiring them with missionary enthusiasm? In reviewing life at the close, as the rising light of eternity breaks on the record, there will be no fact more satisfactory than that of having had a part in this grand work of sending the Gospel into the uttermost parts of the earth.

Enlarging the "Door of Hope"

THE beautiful rescue work, founded by Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, and widely known to our readers and the public generally as "The Door of Hope," has quite outgrown its present accommodations. Forty-three acres of land have been purchased seventeen miles from New York, at Tappan, on the West Shore Road (a quarter of a mile from where the present smaller Home No. II is situated), and will be used in connection with the work. In the city of New York there will simply be a receiving place and temporary shelter, where, after a few days the applicant, if truly desirous of living a better life, will be sent to this beautiful country retreat, to remain until such time as the workers deem best. The work of the Door of Hope is to be divided into three classes, namely: (1). Instructions will be given in house-work. (2). Training in dress-making, fancy sewing, etc. (3). Out-door work, consisting of raising chickens, flowers, etc. Each girl at her departure will receive what is credited to her as pay for her labor. This arrangement, it is believed, will be an inducement to many to remain a longer period at the Home under Bible training and religious influences, and will aid them financially in starting life again. Mrs. Whittemore announces that the workers will also receive a share of the profits (if any) the balance being devoted to the Lord's work. The Door of Hope itself will remain, as formerly, strictly a faith work. In a period of eleven years it has received toward its support $73,000 in voluntary contributions without one cent being solicited. The receiving offices will be at No. 805 Third Avenue, in the rooms of "The Door of Hope Gospel Mission," near 50th Street, New York.

IN MEMORIAM

By REV. THOMAS C. FOSTON, D.D.

BRAVE warrior of Zion! Thy conflict is past,
Thy sword it is sheathed, and rest comes at the last;
In the palace of angels and God thou art now,
A bright starlit diadem girdles thy brow.

What anthems, what pæans of conquest were sung,
By thousands redeemed, as the pearly gates swung
Wide open for thee to that empire of love,
Where service far nobler awaits thee above.

Farewell, stalwart prince! None greater appears,
In all the long record of earth's passing years;
Who won to the Cross of our Saviour and Lord,
Such hosts by proclaiming the conqueror's Word.

O Spirit Divine! Grant new triumphs be won,
While the mantle prophetic descends on the son;
Let a portion twofold to Elisha be given,
With power to win millions from earth into heaven!

Racine Knitting Company, Racine, Wisconsin, offers for sale 100,000 shares of its treasury stock at par value of $10.00 per share full paid and non-assessable. Over one-half of the amount offered has been purchased by investors in all parts of the United States. This stock may be purchased in any amount from one share up.

DIVIDENDS PAYABLE SEMI-ANNUALLY. Earning capacity, 15 per cent. Guaranteed dividends, 6 per cent. The earning power of Racine Knitting Company, with its present equipment, coupled with its constantly increasing business, is 15 per cent. on its capital stock. In order that new stockholders may be assured a certain fixed minimum dividend, the officers of the company, who are thoroughly responsible, personally, aside from their holdings in Racine Knitting Company, guarantee dividends of 6 per cent. per annum. The entire stock of the Company is common stock and all stock shares equally in dividends. It is and will continue to be the policy of the Directors to treat all stockholders equally and fairly. All earnings are and will be divided pro rata over all stock issued. The management is in the hands of conservative people, representing two generations devoted to the textile business. Salaries paid are merely commensurate with services rendered.

OUR OBJECT—Is to gain the influence of stockholders throughout the country. The interest and goodwill manifested for our products by stockholders will do more to promote the sale of our goods than any other advertising we could do. Every stockholder is thus working in a quiet way for the interests of his investment. No other form of business has as strong a reason for a general distribution of its stock, dealing as we are, direct with consuming public, in a line of goods used by everyone. There are not many forms of investment in which you can assist your interests. You cannot and a mine to produce, or do much to strengthen the price of real estate, but with this every stockholder can and is doing a great deal to help himself and every other stockholder's interests.

AN INVESTMENT—NOT A SPECULATION—Every dollar invested in the stock of the Racine Knitting Company represents more than one dollar of live, active, manufacturing assets. We are not asking you to risk your money in a proposition that is experimental but to invest in a business operating on a proven policy. We have no patent rights or processes for sale, but are offering actual property, yielding actual dividends to-day.

STOCK READILY REDEEMED—At any time, for any reason, you desire to convert your stock into ready money, we will sell it for you. We receive orders daily for stock and are in a position to sell all or any part of your holdings that you may desire to realize on.

OUR BUSINESS—We manufacture a full line of Hosiery, Underwear and General Knit-goods, and sell our product direct to the wearer through local salesmen or by mail orders. By this system we save the profits of the middlemen and give the consumer better qualities. We make as serviceable a grade of goods as can be produced. The cuts shown are from photographs of our offices and factories. Our factories are equipped throughout with the most improved makes of automatic machinery, producing goods of the finest grade at a minimum of cost. We have advertised our products under the brand name of "RACINE" for the past four years, and in that time RACINE FEET have become known in nearly every household.

WE INVITE THE MOST CRITICAL INVESTIGATION—We refer to any Bank, Commercial Agency or Express Company. Better still, come and see us. Every detail of our business is open for your inspection, and if you detect a misstatement, we will be glad to refund all expense incident to your visit. Several of our stockholders have investigated our business in person and in every instance have increased their intended subscription.

OUR EXHAUSTIVE PROSPECTUS—Gives a full description of the details of our business and investment proposition. We shall be pleased to send it to you postage paid on receipt of your request. We want local salesmen to represent our line. Address whole cost of selling the same goods to 2,000 separate stores, scattered everywhere. The fiercest competition in America centers in the effort to get our trade. The prices we pay are never much above cost; and goods that we cannot buy low enough are made in factories of our own. Is it any wonder that we can sell for about what common dealers pay? We get along with a fraction of the profit charged by stores. We have no salesmen—no selling expense save our catalogue. A dealer must make several times as much on each article to pay his expenses and live. Our expense is but a small percentage when spread over sales that amount to millions of dollars annually.

THIS book tells pretty nearly what your dealer pays for everything. It quotes wholesale prices on 70,000 articles, and shows pictures of 17,000 of them. It includes practically everything that anybody uses, wears or eats; and its prices are the lowest ever quoted. It will save the average family at least $100.00 per year—some $500.00. Two million people send for this book yearly as a buying guide, and we want you to have one, too.

For 30 Years we have been selling merchandise by mail at about what dealers pay. Ours is the original catalogue business, and the greatest mail order house in the world. This enormous business has been gained and held by underselling everybody, treating customers fairly, and doing as we agree.

Two Million People are now numbered among our customers. We carry for them a stock valued at $2,500,000. We employ 2,000 clerks to fill their orders. It requires 100 typewriters to write our letters to them.

You Need This Book because you can rely on it. Other catalogues are offered you, but this one is best. Our house is the oldest and largest, and our prices are always the lowest. Our guarantee is the fairest, and our record of a quarter century assures you of fair dealing. We keep our customers.

We Guarantee Satisfaction and safe delivery. Every article in our catalogue is described exactly as it is. Not the slightest exaggeration is ever permitted. But if anything you get doesn't suit you in quality, or price, or fit, send it back and we will replace it. Or we will send your money back, and pay transportation both ways. We consider no expense or effort too great to avoid having one dissatisfied customer.

Send Only 15 Cents

If you want our catalogue, fill out carefully the slip to the left of this, and mail it to us today, enclosing 15 cents. This catalogue which we offer you costs us about 70c to print, even in million lots. The postage on it costs us 22c more. Question of the Week

Is it right, under any circumstances, to pray for riches?

Riches, as well as any other earthly good, are the gift of God, and deserve to be considered in this light. If one desires riches, that he may have more power to do good, there seems to be no just ground why he should not consider it proper to pray for them. We know that riches are a source of great temptation, and that, as a matter of fact, they are frequently, if not almost constantly, misused, so that great grace is needed in order to their proper use. But the thoroughly consecrated soul will pray that he may be kept from perverting God's gifts. If we pray for riches to use them for our own pleasure alone, we do wrong. But many a man has prayed for riches, that he might have the means to benefit the world, and help toward the advancement of Christ's kingdom. If these things are kept in view, we see no reason why one should not pray for riches. J. A. TROSTLE.

Yes; to Use Them for God's Cause

George W. Childs, when a boy, one Christmas time, wished he were rich that he might buy everyone a Christmas present. This was certainly a commendable desire, and one for which he might pray. He became a man of wealth and a great philanthropist. When one sees the great need of money, for the advancement of God's cause, while many who possess wealth spend it in such a foolish and selfish manner, one might rightly be led to pray: "O Lord (if it is thy will), give me the power to obtain riches, honestly, that I may use it for thy glory!" IDA SHARP.

Yes; if the Motive be Unselfish

Shall one pray for riches? Yes, if his motive is service not selfishness. In taking this answer practically, one should remember that God knows better than we do where we will best fit in his great plan for redeeming the world. One should, therefore, feel perfectly contented after praying for riches, even if God were to answer in the negative. There would still be the consciousness of his wisdom. Contentment with the answer would indeed go far toward revealing one's true motive in praying. A. A. HOBSON.

Riches a Cause of Temptation

Not if for self alone. When Christ warns us to beware of the deceitfulness of riches, and teaches us to pray, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," how can we consistently pray to God to give us that which renders us doubly susceptible to temptation, and which, accordingly, is the root of all evil, even though it might be made the means of much, if not all good? "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God." "Go, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven." The prophets and about him. When reminded of paying tribute, he wrought a miracle to pay his and Peter's taxes. J. S. McNULTY.

Wealth Not an Evil

Wealth is not an evil when rightly used. If we desire it simply for our own selfish pleasure it is wrong, but if our lives are wholly consecrated to Christ and we live daily in this thought, "I am not my own. I am bought with a price, therefore all I have and am are his," it will not be wrong to pray for riches. If we earnestly and honestly covet riches to be used for the glory of God and the good of humanity, then it is right to ask for them. MRS. HENRY LEWIS.

"Seek First the Kingdom"

No. There is no example in the Bible of any one praying for riches. God made Abraham rich. Solomon asked wisdom and with wisdom God added riches. Angur made a sensible petition: "Give me neither poverty nor riches . . . lest I be full and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be offered in the right manner. Jabez, called on the God of Israel, saying: "Oh, that thou wouldst bless me indeed and enlarge my coast." This was a prayer for increase of worldly possessions, and we are informed that God granted the request. From this, we may infer that God was pleased with his petition. But when prayer is offered for riches, three things should be borne in mind: First, that we must work as well as pray. If a man prays for riches, and then folds his hands waiting for God to add to his possessions, he does wrong. Second, when he has not properly used what he has already in his possession, it is wrong to ask for more. Third, temporal things are never good unless they are to be used for good ends, for the glory of God and the advancement of his kingdom. Riches are to be sought, and it is not improper to pray for them. But it should be remembered when asking for them, that they are the smallest of the Christian treasures. MARY C. LEE.

The Blessing Upon Generosity

There is the instance of a wealthy philanthropist in England who, when in straitened circumstances prayed with his wife, saying, "Of all thou givest me, surely I will give a part of it to the poor." He prospered from that hour, and a few years ago gave to the city in which he lives, a fine park situated in the poorest quarter of the city. On the other hand, a lady of my acquaintance, tired of long privation and self-denial, fervently prayed for a change in her life—for riches and ease. As she rose from her prayer she thought she felt the faith and peace that comes with assured answer; but in a few days all she had of worldly possessions were taken from her. Stunned by the unexpected change, she began to look for the cause, and found that the idea uppermost in her mind when she prayed was self-pity. By slow processes prosperity has come to her. MRS. BERT BARROWS.

The Right Use of Riches

Certainly. Riches are not wrong in themselves. God hears our prayers. It depends upon how we seek that we have asked God for, and what we do with it. The case of George Muller is an example of praying for great riches, and the God-like use of them. Bristol's orphanages are an every-day object-lesson of prayer, of answered prayer, of prayer for money, for great sums, and the best use of it. One may think of one's children, of nobler enterprises for the employment and good of many, and much more. The creation of libraries, the endowment of education, the spread of the Gospel, the uplift of the poor, need great riches. It is certainly right to pray for them. R. CONKLING.

Miscellaneous Questions

Reader, Manchester, N. H. Is a Christian justified in refusing to join a church, some of whose members are profane, insulting, and backsliders?

We believe that an earnest Christian may be able to accomplish more good even under such adverse and unattractive conditions, by joining than by staying away. Personal contact with him, and the force of his example will have a beneficial effect upon the others and may be instrumental in their reformation. Nothing is to be gained by staying away, whereas a great victory is open to one who prays and perseveres.

The pastor of the poor church, whose need of a communion service was recently mentioned in the MAIL-BAG, is requested to send his address to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

apostles were poor in this world's goods, but rich toward God. Moses accounted the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. Job was a poet only while he was poor. It pleased God when Solomon, instead of asking for long life and riches, desired "a wise and understanding heart." Marcus Aurelius says his mother taught him "to have regard for religion, to be generous and open-handed," and to choose "a plain, inexpensive way of living, very different from the common luxury of the rich." Society, church, and state, like individuals, fall into divers temptations when materially rich and powerful, and are truly strong only when "poor," i. e., simple in spirit. LUCIEN V. RULE.

Follow Christ's Example

No, it is not. We should pray to give us neither poverty nor riches. Christ said to his disciples, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God." Paul said to Timothy, "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition." Christ when upon earth gave no such example; he thought so little about money that he did not keep it poor and steal." God knows the temporal needs of each of his children, and he said: "Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." He gives talents to each according to ability. He may withhold riches from some in his wisdom, for with riches come great temptations and responsibilities.

S. F. ELLIOTTE.

We May Pray for Wealth

It is always right to pray for riches. Riches are God's good gift, though he gives infinitely better. It would be wrong to pray for riches, that we might minister to our own ease or vanity. It is right to pray for the means of helping others, of advancing Christ's cause. It is wrong to pray for riches as if God must give them. This is rebellion against his will and cannot bring a blessing. We should pray for wealth, and leave it with God whether we get it. Riches in themselves are never an evil. It is the love of them that is a root of evil. A. W. LEWIS.

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

A SERVICE IN A CHILDREN'S CHURCH

The Story of a Unique Experiment in Religious Work in Brooklyn, N. Y., and Its Gratifying Results

BEGIN with the children, is becoming more and more a recognized principle in practical religious work. Wherever earnest and persistent effort is made to reach the young and impressionable atures, the greatest and most lasting spiritual results follow. During the last two winters, the Rev. Erwin Dennett, pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist Church, on Clinton Street and Third Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., has conducted a special service for boys and girls at 6.30 P.M. each Sunday evening. These meetings began in December, 1900, and continued for nineteen successive Sunday evenings. A bulletin appeared before the church, announcing that 300 boys and girls were wanted to attend an illustrated Gospel service, held especially for them on the next Sunday evening. About sixty were present at the first meeting, but the number rapidly increased to four, five, six and seven hundred—and until the church was crowded to the doors. This state of things continued during the entire season.

Last October the meetings began again, and were continued for twenty-seven Sunday evenings. The attendance of children became so great long before the time for the service, that it was found necessary to have the police present to put them in line in order to prevent accidents before opening the gates. Usually the meetings lasted one hour, thus allowing fifteen minutes in which to clear and ventilate the audience-room in preparation for the evening service at 7.45. Every foot of space in which a boy or girl could be allowed to stand or sit, was occupied.

As these services are unique and have been productive of excellent spiritual results, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD desired the pastor, for the benefit of others, to describe the methods employed. They are very simple. Pastor Dennett believes in the consecration of the stereopticon to Gospel work among the children, so he used a fine dissolving view apparatus and the best pictures obtainable. Mr. Charles J. Peck, one of the trustees of the church, and a very busy man, week days, operates the lantern. All this has meant much hard work, but the pastor and his aid have cheerfully performed it, feeling rewarded by seeing the great crowds of children thus drawn together to listen to the Gospel message. The endeavor has been to make these meetings strictly Gospel services. Hymns with rousing choruses are thrown upon the screen, and the vigorous and tuneful singing of them by seven hundred boys and girls is a thing to be remembered. A solo or two in each service produces fine effect, being beautifully illustrated. The words, too, are thrown on the canvas as the music is sung. All the expenses of these meetings, such as calcium light, hire of pictures and extra slides, are met by the children's "penny collections." Several helpers are always at hand beside the police to Bothwell, Mr. O. Garrabrant, Mr. L. Jensen, and Mr. A. Kiesling. They, with others, assisted more or less in the hard work which these services have involved. Mrs. H. Perine and Miss Helen M. Dennett, have presided at the piano during the two seasons. Many ladies and gentlemen, at different times, have rendered fine solos to the great delight of the children, who appreciate music.

At a recent service the subject of discourse was "Beautiful Snow." The meeting opened with the singing from the screen, followed by prayer by the pastor. Next, there appeared on the screen quite a number of beautiful winter scenes. Then came the great truth of the evening, "Is there anything whiter than snow?" David's prayer, "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow," and the snow promise in Isaiah were dwelt upon, showing that a heart washed in the blood of Jesus is whiter even than the spotless crystals of snow. This was followed by a series of beautiful Bible pictures, showing some of those whom Jesus washed: the sinful woman at his feet; the paralytic, healed and forgiven; the man at Bethesda's pool, and the thief on the cross.

These congregations are made up of boys and girls of all kinds and conditions—Protestant and Catholic. Their behavior is excellent, because they are deeply interested. Many children have remained at the after-service, to be talked and prayed with, and there can be no more profitable spiritual work than this. The harvest may not be apparent at once, but impressions are made on young hearts that can never be effaced.

Pastor Dennett, during these children's services, has taken up, among other suitable subjects, the following:

How God's Works Praise Him; A King Born in a Stable; A Twelve-year-old Boy Alone in a Great City; The Boy That Went Wrong; The Greatest Storm in the History of the World; The Drunkard's Daughter; Sowing and Reaping; A Sheep that Went Astray; The Girl who Chose Death Rather than Deny her Lord, &c.

He avails himself of any good picture, Biblical, historical, temperance, scientific, landscape, or anything that will impress the truths of God's Word upon a child's heart. The field is large for this kind of work. There are enough children thronging the streets of every great city to fill all the churches.

Many similar services have been organized in other churches as the result of these meetings. May the good work go on, and may the children have something put before their eyes better than the vile pictures which they see constantly on the billboards of the streets.

be available in an emergency. Among those to whom the pastor is especially indebted in this regard during the two seasons are Mr. J. W. Braithwaite, Mr. S. C. Hoag, Superintendent of the Sunday School, Mr. J. W.

Bothwell, Mr. O. Garrabrant, Mr. L. Jensen, and Mr. A. Kiesling. They, with others, assisted more or less in the hard work which these services have involved. Mrs. H. Perine and Miss Helen M. A TRENCHANT WARNING

TEXT—Proverbs 1: 10: "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not"

NO cathedral, it matters not how lofty the spires, or how wonderful the statuary, or how mazy and bewildering the architecture, awes the tourist into reverence unless Time has hallowed it. Then the centuries have covered up the crumbling walls with moss and creeping ivy. Then Westminster Abbey, with its dark, damp, dripping vaults, has become the sepulchre of dead kings and queens. In the same way, no man has a right to give advice or tell us what to do unless gray hairs begin to fringe the forehead, or he can speak out of his own bitter experience. It is absurd for the ruddy-faced lad to write an essay upon sorrow, when the only sorrow he ever felt was the fright from the dentist pulling his first baby teeth. And what audience does not smile when listening to the schoolboy's bombastic graduation oration upon "How to win success." No reformer can have great influence in attacking a club-room, when he himself is so unsocial that the hearers dislike the reformer worse than they despise his teachings?

Every speech, every sermon, every argument, every essay must be backed up by the personality of the individual. It is said that when John J. Crittenton arose to address a jury and ran his fingers through his long gray hair, his case was already half won. All Kentuckians knew John J. Crittenton would not defend a client unless he himself believed in that man's innocence. You must respect the speaker before you can respect his speech.

King Solomon wrote with authority. He had drunk from the chalices of pleasure. He had quaffed to the bitter dregs every cup of woe. He had seen the ups as well as the downs of life. He was no fanatic or adventurer. He was the king who sat upon the richest throne of the then known world. His pillared halls were lined with statuary. The fountains which played in his gardens moistened the throats of birds whose ancestors once cleansed their plumage or sang their young to sleep in foreign lands. His cellars were filled with wine of choicest vintage.

The Words of a Wise Man

The throne room and judgment hall were circled by rooms above rooms. Nearby were his harems, in which the king gathered one thousand wives and concubines. As the wit once wrote of Brigham Young, King Solomon was the most married man that ever lived. Not only was he great, and increased more than all that were before him in Jerusalem, but his wisdom remained with him. When two women claimed a little child, Solomon ordered his executioner to cut the baby in twain and give half to each. The real mother fell on her knees and begged him to save the child, and if necessary to give it to her enemy. Then said Solomon: "She is the true mother; give her the child." As a gardener, he knew all about flowers; as an equestrian, all about horses; as an architect, all about buildings. He made the ant our teacher. As a merchant, he lingered in the busy marts to tell us how to trade. To-day, amid wealth and power, within sound of clinking tankards of gold and rumbling chariot wheels, the old sage writes an eternal protest against sin: "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."

Young men dislike to be patronized. Although willing to accost each other in terms of familiarity, we dislike older people to pat us condescendingly upon the back. So to-day, as a young man, I thought you young people would let me try to interpret these words of the Bible. I would especially interpret them now, because many of you who have come from far away, are for the first time living in a great city. You are away from home, away from father and mother. Unless you start right, you will never end right. "The glory of young men is their strength." The way to keep that strength is to refuse to allow the sinful dissipations to sap the virility of youth.

King Solomon warns the young people against sin, because young folks are apt to be thoughtlessly reckless. They do not want to be bad. They have no intention of throwing overboard all the past teachings of probity and right. They are naturally religious. They say their prayers when they arise in the morning. They say their prayers again before going to bed at night. But they are full of fun and animal spirits. They laugh and sing and frolic, just as a colt capers, a kitten plays with her tail, and a bird flies hither and thither for the mere pleasure of flying. A full-blooded lad cannot keep still. He squirms and twists and whippers, and passes notes in the schoolroom. He does about everything that the teacher tells him not to do. If you ask him why he does thus, he could not answer. What schoolboy when out in the country has not tried to see how near he could skate to the air-hole in the ice? What boy has not fished when standing upon a rolling log, or has not tried to walk across a dangerous trestle, or has not climbed a steep precipice until his brain was dizzy with vertigo? What boy has not tried to swim across a river merely because the older boys said he could not?

When Benedict Arnold was a young man, he would catch hold of the spokes of the mill-wheel, and be dragged round and round, in and out of the water, merely to terrorize the miller, who thought the boy was going to die. When a healthy boy at boarding-school, did you not love to go rowing? Did you not pull the boat so far from shore, that when the storm came up it was almost impossible to get back?

Insidious Temptation

That is the spirit with which young people enter a large city. This is the first time you have ever been away from home. At the first manifestation of sin, you were shocked, and horrified. You were always accustomed to a sacred Sabbath. You went to church regularly. But now you find that most of the clerks and students in the boarding-house consider Sunday a play-day, instead of a holy day, a time for outdoor sports instead of sacred communion. Then you begin to grow hardened. Instead of keeping your toe to the straight line of principle, you are willing to make small digressions. You say, "This will not hurt me, and the other thing will not hurt me." Now it will be taking a Sunday drive. To-morrow it will be drinking a glass of beer or lounging about a pool-room. The next day it will be playing a game of cards for a small wager. The next day it will be going to a cheap variety show. Oh, young man, I beseech you, by the help of God, to resist these first yieldings to sin. It is not stupidity to be pure and good and upright. It is not cowardly to run away from the blandishments of sin. The first wrong step may be the step over the brink of eternal death. The first flush of shame mantling the cheek may be the hellfire destroying the soul. "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."

A wealthy gentleman once advertised for a coachman. To every applicant who came he put this one question: "How near can you drive a team of horses to the edge of a precipice without going over?" "Well," answered one would-be coachman, "I can go within twenty feet." "Well," answered another, "I could go within twelve feet." "Well," answered a third, "I could go within eight feet," and another said, "Within five feet." At last, one applicant said, "If the horses amounted to anything, I would be so frightened that I would take the other side of the road, and get as far away from the precipice as I could." "Ah!" answered the gentleman, "you are the man I am looking for. I do not want the driver who runs into danger, but the man who will stay away. I'll hire you." Who is the wise navigator. The helmsman who points the ship's prow towards the reef where hundreds of wrecks strew the coast, or the pilot who keeps the keel in deep waters? Are you recklessly going to do that which your father and mother, the Bible, the church and all good men and all good women tell you not to do?

Loneliness in a City

King Solomon warns against sin because young people are apt to become despondent. Perhaps this discouragement will be caused by homesickness. The loneliest place on earth is a great city. In the country town, you knew everybody and everybody knew you. While the village minister was preaching, you would be watching the neighbor's daughter, whom you expect some day to make your wife. When you trudged away to school, every farm wagon which went by was ready to give you a lift. When the poor woman back among the hills was sick, your mother made up a package and bade you carry it to the house. That poor woman always greets you now with a smile. But here, in this great city, you do not even know the man who lives across the hall. Perhaps you say "Good morning" to him, but that is all. When you come home at night there is nothing but the cold, uninviting bedroom. You long again for the farm, for the thatched roof of the old homestead, for the smell of the new-mown hay, and the sight of the great presses vehemently at work squeezing the orchard's blood into barrels and casks. St. John's wilderness of rock is a fit name for a great city. It is a wilderness—and there are no wilder beasts of passion roaming among forests than some of the human monsters which live here.

Perhaps your discouragement comes from injustice. You may have been living in the great city now for two years. You worked, and worked hard. Then came a vacancy in the store. Of course you expected the promotion; but another clerk under you, who was not as bright nor as faithful as you, had influence, and he was pushed ahead. Then you protested—and vehemently protested. All that the manager did was to laugh and say: "Well, if you don't like it, get out." You could not get out. You had no place to go. You sullenly went back to the desk, saying: "What is the use of trying. Honesty is not the best policy."

Perhaps your discouragement came in a cruel way. You had your foot upon the lowest rung and were beginning to climb the ladder of success, when suddenly the hard times came. The firm dissolved and you were discharged. You are now not only looking for a new place, but you have to commence all over again. Now comes the warning against temptations. Now the old sage tells me to put the hand of love upon your shoulder and say: "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."

I give you this warning gladly and willingly, my brother, because these are the troubles which are fitting you for the mighty successes which are to come. Remember this great lesson. Anything which develops quickly dies quickly. The insects are generated and grow to maturity in a few hours, but they also die of old age by night. The gourd which spread itself as an umbrella over the head of the prophet Jonah withered as soon as it was touched of the east wind. The flower which blossoms in the spring goes to seed before the fall. It takes years and years to develop a cedar of Lebanon. It takes centuries upon centuries to bury a coal mine. It takes at least one score years to make a man. And the more obstacles you can overcome the more of a giant you will be. Only the gods can reach the stars. Man can become like unto a God if God is with him and he keeps on stretching.

A Missionary's Dream

There is a beautiful story told of a missionary who became very much discouraged. No conversions resulted from his work. He determined to leave his field. That night as he slept, he had a strange dream. He dreamed that an angel had given him a hammer and placed him before a huge rock and said to him, "Pound, and keep on pounding." He pounded on him, but could not break the rock. Because he was unsuccessful, he sat down and wept. But while he wept the angel again appeared and said, "Why dost thou weep?" "Because I cannot break the rock." Then said the angel, "Thou hast nothing to do with the results. Pound, and pound, and keep on pounding, whether thou breakest the rock or no." The dreamer arose, picked up the hammer, and smote the rock with a mighty blow. Lo, the rock broke! Solomon bids me give to you the hammer of persistence. He tells me to point you to the rock of adversity, saying: "Strike! Strike! until the fires of heaven flash. Strike for your life! And keep on striking!"

King Solomon warns the young folks against sin, because evil companions are always the first to extend the right hand of welcome. The good young man says: "I cannot afford to associate with everyone. I cannot go with every stray acquaintance whom I meet upon the street. I should live in the city as I live at home. I ought not to consort with any companion whom I would be ashamed to introduce to my mother or sisters." When you enter the store as a fellow-clerk, he watches you. By conversation he finds out whether or no you are a church-member. He is too busy to gossip during business hours, and so it will take some time for him and you to become fast friends. After awhile, he will invite you to attend a night school, or go to some lecture or meeting. He asks you what books you read, and then offers to lend you one of the classics. By and by, you arrange to take your vacations together. Then the good young man gives to you the highest compliment of his life—he asks you to come home with him and visit his mother. That dear old lady welcomes you as only his mother can. She knows your own home is so far away that it is impossible for you to go there and get back to the store when the two holidays are over.

Fair-weather Friends

But the bad young man is never hard to become acquainted with. He will slap you upon the back as soon as you enter the store. He offers you a cigarette, or invites you later to take a drink. He stops you in the hall and wants to have a long talk. He is always loafing when the head of the department is away. After a little while he begins to make fun of your Bible. He ridicules you as stingy, because you send most of your money home to support a widowed mother and five fatherless children. And then if you have money to spend, he and his evil companions will gather around you to help spend it, if you will let them, as a field of clover tops will empty all the beehives from far and near. But after your money is gone, and position gone, and health gone, and honor gone, they will care no more for you than for a dead cur in the street. The night you die the saloons will be as crowded, the glasses will clink just as merrily as ever. At that bar which you now frequent, there will not be a tear shed over you.

The Gospel Among Lebanon's Cedars

FROM Mrs. Ghosn-el-Howie, the wife of a well-known missionary at Shweir, Mount Lebanon, and herself a devoted missionary worker, comes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an interesting letter written by her husband, giving an account of the character of the work that falls to the lot of a native preacher in Syria.

"It is nearly nine years since my wife, two children, and myself left my adopted country, Canada, for the East. After a sojourn in Jerusalem, we came to the village of Shweir, my birthplace, and I began there my labors as a preacher of the Gospel among mine own countrymen. For nearly three-quarters of a century Protestant missionaries from the West have been laboring. Over thirty societies, employing some 250 laborers (possibly more), have been operating in Syria, chiefly by means of educational and industrial institutions.

"My work, for which God calls me, is the preaching of the Gospel to the unlettered. We have been here nine years, and we have lacked nothing as yet. We are convinced that God is not limited to any particular mode of operating; but in every case He 'doeth all things well.'"

"When we came here, I did not know how my family was to be supported; but just as little did I know where I was to preach. There are no public halls here and I had no means of building any. In due time, my request to preach in some of the native churches and to hold small meetings in private houses, was granted. In Damascus, Baalbec and intermediate places, I had all the opportunities of which I could avail myself to preach the Gospel both in public and private. This field has the best claims to my activity and my duty is to remain at my post here, still trusting that God, who has provided maintenance for us in the past will continue to provide for us in the future. The common people are in many parts free to hear the old Gospel story, and Christians everywhere will pray for us and wish us well in our efforts to tell it.

"Recently we left our mountain village for Damascus. The first part of our route was made on mules, over the rough, stony roads of Mount Lebanon, as far as Zahleh. Thence it is open to the traveler to continue his journey to Damascus by rail, by carriage or on camel-back. We stopped at some of the most interesting points on the route and gathered much material for future use.

"It is true that it was an ancient city in the days of Abraham, for not only was the steward of his house, Eleazer-el Dimishki, the son of a Damascene, but tradition says that after Abraham left Padan-Aram for the land of Canaan he 'reigned' in Damascus. At any rate whether it was the first city founded or not, it is indisputably the oldest surviving city on the face of the earth. It has seen the rise and fall alternately of all the great Babylonian, Egyptian, Persian, Greek and Roman Empires, and though its history is interwoven with that of all, and though the records of millenniums are being unearthed to-day in ancient Babylonia, Damascus, the oldest city in the world, continues the thread of her history down to the present moment, and its sons and daughters perpetuate that stream of life which has not ceased to animate that important centre. Since its birth, how many millenniums ago no one can tell, the ashes of her many cities lie piled upon one another, to be sifted probably in the millenniums to come by the antiquary of the remote future.

"Damascus shows traces to-day (in the survival of the six immense columns, with highly ornamented capitals, at the entrance of the Great Mosque, in the heart of the city), of the influence of Greek architecture centuries before our era, and the rows of columns which lined the Via Recta (Straight street) in the days of the Romans, now lie buried under the mud or dust that covers the street, which still retains its ancient name, though alas all traces of the magnificence it rejoiced in when Paul the Apostle lodged in it, have vanished completely, and its appearance, together with the rest of the city, is in keeping with the Oriental character to which it has reverted, and which is largely minus the art and civilization it enjoyed under the ancient masters of the world. Notwithstanding the comparatively insignificant position Damascus now holds in the modern world, it is replete with interest to the traveler.

"One of the photographs I send will give your readers a practical illustration of 'drinking in the East.' The drinker takes up a 'breck' (earthenware pitcher with a narrow spout in the side of it), full of water, and holding it at arms' length, pours the water in a gurgling stream into his open mouth, not touching the vessel with his lips. It is then passed on to the next drinker. This is the ordinary way of drinking water by the fellahs (peasants), and by all who do not follow frangi (European) ways of living."

ON THE WAY TO DAMASCUS

The day your body is buried, the very friends who are now enticing you away will gamble just as recklessly and laugh just as loud with others as they now do with you, and if necessary, and they could find no other place, they would be willing to gamble at your grave.

Some years ago in Glasgow a team of horses took fright and ran away. The coachman was hurled from his box. The carriage was tossed about from side to side. With snort and lathered flanks the mad creatures ran on. Inside of the vehicle was seen the pale face of a woman, whose arms clasped to her bosom a little child. You might as well have tried to stop a thunderbolt as to stop that runaway. Down the street they came faster and faster. The carriage grazed this post and that wheel. The people cleared the track. Suddenly, from out of the crowd a man sprang. He was dressed in the common clothes of a laborer. With almost superhuman strength he caught the bits of the wild animals. Though they trampled him under foot, and were beating out his life, he hung on until they were halted. The bystanders helped the fainting woman out of the carriage. Loving hands carried the poor bleeding body of the laborer to the hospital. That night, one of the finest mansions of all Scotland was lighted. A party was going on. The guests and friends were congratulating the hostess upon her escape from almost certain death. In the early hours of morning the neighbors heard the noise of song and mirth and merriment. Not far from that mansion, in one of the public wards of the hospital, a hero's life was ebbing away. It was the life of the poor man who that afternoon flung himself under the sharp iron hoofs. As the nurse was moistening the dry lips, and lifting him just a little; and as the gurgling was sounding in the throat, he asked: "Has she not been to see me?" "No," was the answer, "she is at a party and can't come." "Oh," said the dying man, "I did hope she would think enough of me to come just for one moment." Such will be the indifference of evil companions, after they have wrecked your life. Are you ready to sacrifice all that you hold dear for such friends?

One day, some gentlemen were talking to my uncle, and one said: "Is it not strange how willing the world is to kick a man when he is down?" "No," answered my uncle, "I do not think the world kicks a man so much when he is down as when he is trying to stand up." "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."

King Solomon warns the young people not to consent to sin, because after we have once yielded, we will never be the same again. It would be pleasant if we could go on sinning, and then after awhile say, "I guess I will stop and start over again." But we cannot say or do that. Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. If a man make a bed of roses, he sleeps in a cloud of incense. If he gather only the thorns, he must be lacerated by the thorns. After you have once robbed, the firm will never fully trust you. After you have once wrecked your health, you can never be anything but a suffering invalid. After you have once led an immortal soul astray, and that soul has departed from earth to meet its judgment at the bar of God, you can never change its eternal destiny. Many a man to-day would willingly cut off his right arm if he could only change the past. He cannot. The past is forever dead; unless that past can be changed in a heavenly sense through the mercy and the pardon of God. Make not the mistake which so many older men have made, of having a bad record during the period of youth, and then having that record curse all the mid-noon and the twilight of your existence, and curse you down to the grave.

During the persecution of the Huguenots in France, a father and mother had to flee from the city for their lives. They had to leave behind an only girl. Fearing lest he should not recognize his child again, the father took a sharp knife and cut the arm of the child almost to the bone. Time passed on. The war was ended, and the father and mother returned to the French capital. They went everywhere looking for their long-lost daughter. When the father thought he saw his child, he would examine the arm just above the wrist. At last he found his child. He found her by the proof of a red scar. So Satan puts the fatal mark of sin upon every one of his disciples. Though we may repent of our past, though we may agonize before the mercy seat and ask God to forgive us our sins; though we may receive a heavenly pardon, we cannot in an earthly sense obliterate the tell-tale signs of the past. We cannot destroy the earthly effects of youth's follies any more than a Lady Macbeth could cleanse the blood off her fingers by plunging them into an ocean of tears;

But the greatest lesson of this text is yet to be spoken. Solomon tells us not to let evil companions entice us away. But man is a social being. He longs for friends. He must have friends who will associate with him when he weeps as well as laughs, when he is dying as well as when he is strong and well. As Solomon bids you to beware of evil companions, I will introduce to you one who will be the best Friend a young man ever had. Young man, you cannot afford to face the temptations of a great city alone. Perhaps you know about this loving Friend, to whom I want to introduce you. He was with your sister when she died. Well, you remember how she smiled up into his face. He was with your mother during all her troubles in life. The last words your father spoke on earth was his name. That name; shall I speak it? Jesus! Jesus! Jesus! That is the Friend who will see you all the way through if you will only trust him. You must now make a choice. A choice between this dear Friend and evil companions. This is a very anxious moment for many of us. It is an anxious moment for Christ as well as for you.

One dark night, a watchman fell asleep at his post and failed to signal the lightning express. Leaping to his feet when the flying engine, as a shrieking monster shot by, he saw the train disappear, and realized that the drawbridge was open and all the passengers were lost. It was too much for human brain. The man went stark mad. Friends found him shivering and cowering in the corner of his room a raving maniac, muttering to himself: "Oh, if I only had! if I only had!" Here comes thundering along the limited express full of Gospel invitation. The train is flying with the speed of the lightning. What are you going to do in reference to Christ before it is too late? Over the dark abyss of sin will you throw the strong, straight beam of the Cross, or will you let evil companions crush your hopes into ruins? Shall you be smiled at by the angel of hope, or hissed at by the voice of despair? Will you accept this Jesus as your friend? Your loved ones, your Heavenly Father, your Saviour, and the Holy Spirit await the answer, "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."

DESTROYED BY A RAIN OF FIRE!

St. Pierre, with its 25,000 Inhabitants, Meets the Fate of Pompeii --- A Movement to Relieve the Suffering Survivors

HUMANITY shudders in contemplating the frightful disaster which has overtaken the seaport of St. Pierre, in the island of Martinique, West Indies. From all that can be learned, the city seems to have met a fate almost identical with that of Herculaneum and Pompeii, and very similar to the fate of the doomed cities of the Dead Sea plain—Sodom and Gomorrah. Mont Pelee, a volcano 4,428 feet high, at whose base the city lies, has always been a menace, although it has had no serious eruptions in recent years, and until the morning of May 8 was considered harmless.

Vessels passing St. Pierre early on Thursday morning, May 8, saw a strange and terrifying spectacle. About 8 o'clock A.M. the captain and crew of the schooner Ocean Traveler, of St. John, N. B., was

A waterspout in the harbor, of gigantic dimensions, added to the horrors of the scene.

There were some sixteen or eighteen steamers and sailing vessels in the harbor of St. Pierre, but only one escaped. She was the British steamer Roddam. She only escaped destruction because she had a full pressure of steam on when the eruption occurred, and was able to run out of the harbor. She was struck by pieces of the white hot lava, and her rigging was burned off. Her captain was seriously burned. Seventeen of her crew perished. All her officers, engineers and the surviving members of the crew, are either so badly injured by the lava or by inhaling the sulphurous fumes thrown out by the volcano, that there is little chance of saving their lives. Four of the eighteen vessels destroyed were American. United States Consul, T. T. Prentis, and miles is buried under great masses of hot ashes, from which choking, sulphurous fumes still arise. The British Royal Mail steamer Esk attempted to reach St. Pierre, but was unable to do so, as the city was blazing. She sent a boat ashore, but the crew did not see a living soul. At latest accounts, the eruption was subsiding, and a landing had been effected by relief crews, but the entire population had perished. The streets were strewn with corpses horribly charred and decaying. Preparations were made to cremate all the dead. Mont Pelee had dwindled down to a hill one-third its former size. It had become the grave of a beautiful city with 25,000 souls and $120,000,000 of treasure. 250 lie dead in the harbor among the wrecked shipping. 7,000 houses in the city are demolished by fire, and covered by ashes and lava, and fully 500 more in other parts of Martinique.

a few miles off Martinique, when suddenly the huge dark mass of Mont Pelee, the volcano back of the town, exploded. In an instant the whole sky for miles around seemed to be filled with fire. The top or cap of the volcano, unable to withstand the tremendous pressure, had blown off, and the liberated gases and steam hurled great masses of lava, white and glowing with fierce heat, far into the air. This fell upon the city, enveloping it in flames and utterly destroying it in a few moments. At the same instant there seemed to issue from the rent sides of the volcano near the top a stream of fire which added to the general destruction. Molten lava and boiling mud belched forth, mingling with great sheets of flame and fierce sulphurous blasts, and carrying in their train great clouds of sand, dust, ashes and lava.

his entire family, are supposed to have perished. The Quebec Steamship Company's steamer Roraima, which was at St. Pierre, was lost, and 138 of a crew of 150 perished. The British cable steamer Grappler was the first vessel to be destroyed. All her officers and crew were lost. The Grappler belonged to the West India and Panama Telegraph Company, of London. She was a steamer of about 500 tons, carried a crew of about 100 men, all of whom, with the exception of the officers, were natives of the Danish West Indies. Captain Boreham was her commander.

About 25,000 persons are believed to have perished in the disaster which overwhelmed St. Pierre. Probably 15,000 more died in other parts of the island. The whole town and the surrounding country for several

The French cruiser, Suchet, brought to Guadeloupe confirmatory news of the disaster. Mr. Campbell, the purser of the Roddam, and ten of her crew were lost by jumping overboard while the steamer was at St. Pierre. The Suchet saved thirty persons from burning ships in St. Pierre harbor. Some of her officers went ashore in small boats to attempt to rescue such of the survivors as they could find. They were unable, however, to penetrate into the city. From the wharf where they landed a large number of dead bodies could be seen. The catastrophe, however, did not come without warning. For several days Pelee had emitted smoke and sulphurous vapors, and lava had flowed; but these indications of approaching danger were unheeded.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CENTENNIAL

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE OF THIS ISSUE

THE present week has been marked by one of the most interesting conventions ever held in New York. The One Hundred and Fourteenth Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States met here for the first time in thirteen years, on Thursday, May 15, and the city has been thronged with distinguished representatives of this denomination from all parts of the Union. Long before the day arranged for the gathering, rooms had been engaged in the principal hotels for some seven hundred commissioners, a number of whom would bring wives and daughters.

Besides transacting the important business devolving upon its regular annual session, the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the organization of the Board of Home Missions has been the unique and pleasant function of this Assembly. The following is the programme of the week as it was given out: Wednesday, May 14, a "Conference of Missions," under the direction of the Foreign Board, preliminary to the Assembly; Thursday, opening of the Assembly, sermon by the Moderator, Rev. Dr. Henry C. Minton, of California; election of Moderator for ensuing year; in the evening, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; Friday morning, annual meeting of the Woman's Board; Friday afternoon, general reception to the Assembly in the Presbyterian Building, 156 Fifth avenue, the Boards of Home and Foreign Missions, and of Church Extension acting as hosts, and on Saturday evening, in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, a stereopticon lecture on "Two Centuries of Presbyterianism," by Rev. William C. Covert, of Saginaw, Mich. preceded by an address on religious education by President F. B. Gault, of Whitworth College, Tacoma.

With the Sabbath, the celebration of the centennial was inaugurated, not only in New York, but in churches all over the country, by special exercises emphasizing the anniversary. Here, indeed, it was a day of jubilee and a rare feast of spiritual things was spread in many places of worship. The programme for Monday and Tuesday included historical addresses by Rev. Dr. Henry C. McCook, of Philadelphia, on "From the Atlantic to the Alleghenies"; Rev. Dr. Samuel J. Nicolls, of St. Louis, Mo., on "From the Alleghenies to the Rockies"; Rev. Dr. Edgar P. Hill, Portland, Ore., "From the Rockies to the Pacific"; Conference of Home Missionaries; "Fellowship Meeting," when representatives of Home Mission Boards of the Congregationalist, Baptist, Methodist, Episcopal, and Reformed Churches joined hands in fraternal rejoicings and congratulations with their Presbyterian brethren, and the mass meeting last night in Carnegie Hall with Rev. Dr. Stuart Dodge presiding, and President Roosevelt, the Moderator of the Assembly, Rev. Dr.

Charles L. Thompson and other distinguished gentlemen scheduled as speakers. Additional features of interest conclude the week.

This celebration marks a century of national import-ization's taming processes were well begun. Although it was only in 1802 that the Board of Home Missions was organized, it goes without saying that home mission work had been carried on long before such formal embodiment. The very first presbytery, says Rev. Dr. Wilson Phraner, made recommendation "that every minister use means to supply in neighboring desolate places where a minister is wanting. Also, 'that the state of the frontier settlements be taken into consideration and missionaries be sent them.' A church on Wall street is that first mentioned as receiving aid from Home Mission Funds; the handsome edifice, corner Fifth Avenue and Twelfth street, of which Dr. Duffield is pastor, is its lineal descendant, and is still known as the "Old First Presbyterian Church." Our picture shows the pioneer institution as it appeared in 1719.

The first-stated appointment by the Assembly of a regular missionary was when Rev. Jedediah Chapman was "authorized to employ catechists for the instruction of the Indians and colored people." The Freedman's Aid Society and the widespread Indian missions of the Presbyterian Church of to-day show how very faithfully that little grain of missionary mustard seed has been fostered and tended. The Woman's Board of Home Missions came into existence in 1878. Three names closely associated with the organization and success of this body are those Mrs. Ashbel Green the first Vice-President, Mrs. R. T. Haines, the first Secretary, and Mrs. F. H. Pierson.

Said Dr. Kendall, "nine-tenths of all of our churches were organized under Home Missionary auspices." In 1800 there were 449 Presbyterian churches in the United States, with a membership of 20,000. Dr. Phraner puts the aggregate of the whole Presbyterian element in our country at the beginning of the present century at 15,157 churches; 12,500 ministers; 1,600,000 communicants.

With the expansion of our territory, from the Louisiana purchase in 1803, to recent inclusion of Alaska, Hawaii, the Philippines and Puerto Rico, has come the broadening of the term "Home Mission," until it covers a very wide field and almost innumerable opportunities for good. The tremendous influx of foreign population contributes, too, to the investment of that department of Church work with the gravest responsibilities.

Within our country's boundaries, the home missionary is a national educator, guardian of morals and soldier of peace; and the true American, on grounds of citizenship as well as religious sentiment, must rejoice over the growth of such a great body of public service as is represented by the Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church.

THE "OLD FIRST," THE PIONEER HOME MISSION IN WALL STREET

ance and interest. To the Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church much of the prosperity and progress of our country is due. Its early history has many a thrilling chapter of frontier life; of patient, perilous labors among the red men of the forest e'er civil-seed has been fostered and tended. The Woman's Board of Home Missions came into existence in 1878. Three names closely associated with the organization and success of this body are those Mrs. Ashbel Green the first Vice-President, Mrs. R. T. Haines, the first Secretary, and Mrs. F. H. Pierson.

OFFICERS OF THE PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF HOME MISSIONS

DESTROYED BY A RAIN OF FIRE

Among those thought to have perished are M. Moutet, the French Colonial Governor of Martinique, and his family. There were about 1,000 whites in St. Pierre, some of whom probably fled in time. Pastor King, of St. Pierre, and Senator Knight escaped. M. Tirard, the Procureur-General and his family were saved, having left the city before the disaster. Many may have sought refuge in the Morne Rouge district, which is on the side of Mont Pelee, but sheltered by a spur of the mountain.

Captain J. E. Scott, of the steamship Fontabella, which arrived in New York a few days ago, was at St. Pierre April 26. He saw smoke hovering over the top of Mont Pelee, but the people of St. Pierre did not seem to be at all anxious about it. The officers and crew of the Fontabella supposed the smoke came from forest fires.

Martinique is one of the loveliest islands of the "Lesser Antilles" in the Caribbean Sea. St. Pierre is the principal city, and has a larger population and greater trade than Fort de France, the capital. There are six volcanic peaks on the island, five of which have been long extinct. Near the end of the eighteenth century and again in 1851, Pelee gave signs of life, but there has been no serious eruption until the present overwhelming disaster. The American Consul at Guadeloupe has reported to the State Department at Washington that, in all probability, only some 30 persons have escaped alive from St. Pierre.

To add to the horrors of the Martinique disaster, news came of a volcanic outbreak on the British island of Mt. Vincent. The volcano Soufriere (the Sulphur Pit) became active May 9, one day after the great eruption of Mont Pelee. The earth shook throughout a section of 100 miles. For several days the mountain had shown signs of activity, but on the day mentioned, a great shower of hot lava, ashes and dust fell on the surrounding country. Chateau Belair and Kingston are now nearly two feet deep in ashes. Stones and ashes fell at Georgetown. Seven hundred persons have perished on St. Vincent island so far as known, but the number may prove much larger. Whole families have perished. Governor Llewellyn has gone to the island from St. Lucia on the warship Indefatigable and other vessels have also gone to Kingstown. The eruption of Soufriere turned day into night for hundreds of miles. The outline of the volcano has entirely changed through the violence of its action.

Relief measures have been adopted by the French government, which has appropriated $100,000, and directed its warships to act promptly in order to avert suffering. The British authorities, too, are equally active. The United States Government has appropriated $200,000 for the same purpose, and a government vessel will be dispatched from the Brooklyn Navy Yard with a cargo of supplies. There is urgent need of haste in the work of relief. Dispatches state that great destitution prevails through all the island group of the Lesser Antilles. Showers of dust and ashes have burned up every green thing, scorched fields and forests, blocked up rivers and dried up lakes and streams, and men and beasts are perishing for lack of food and water. Unless help comes quickly, the slain of Mont Pelee will be greatly multiplied by famine. Thousands, who are now dying by inches in that parched and scorched wilderness, will perish unless succor comes soon.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is making preparations to aid in this life-saving work, and it invites its readers to join it in the effort to rescue the suffering survivors in the desolated country around St. Pierre. As this issue goes to press, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is negotiating with the United States Navy Department for the shipment of one thousand barrels of flour and other supplies for the relief of the sufferers, and before this reaches the hands of our readers, the food will be well on its way, the money for the supplies having been advanced personally by the proprietor of this journal. In our next issue, full details of the plan of relief work will be given. Meanwhile contributions are invited. Address all contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD West Indian Relief Work, Bible House, New York. Send quickly and liberally and you may be the means of saving a precious life.

The West Indian Disaster

FROM the West Indies comes the news of an appalling catastrophe closely resembling the disaster which, eighteen centuries ago, overwhelmed Pompeii and Herculaneum. The story, which is told in detail on another page, is full of horrors, eclipsing in magnitude even the terrible catastrophe of 79 A.D. The beautiful town of St. Pierre, in Martinique, lying picturesquely at the base of Mont Pelee, was disturbed on May 3 by the descent of light ashes, which, issuing from the summit of the mountain, covered the town to the depth of a quarter of an inch. Evidently the volcano, which had been quiescent for over half a century, had suffered a spasm of activity. The alarm of the inhabitants appears to have subsided, but on the morning of May 8 there was another eruption. This time it was of molten lava, which descended on the devoted town in a veritable rain of fire. It was so sudden that none could escape, for those who fled from their burning dwellings must have perished in the streets. So complete was the destruction that even the shipping in the harbor was overwhelmed, among which was the Quebec Steamship Company's vessel Roraima, which went down with all on board.

The first feeling on hearing of a calamity so swift and destructive, is one of sympathy for the sufferers. In no circumstances of peril does man seem so helpless as in the presence of a subterranean disturbance. It strikes panic into the most intrepid soul. The ancients conceived of the world as a gigantic being, the mountains his breasts, the valleys his thighs, the trees and grass his hair, and the human race the parasites, whom now and again with an angry shudder he shook off into destruction. Later, the Semitic mind regarded seismic disturbances as divine judgments. Though we have ceased to look upon it as the patriarch did, as the direct act of God, "who shaketh the earth out of her place and the pillars thereof tremble, who toucheth the hills and they smoke," yet there is the sense of a mighty and mysterious power which may do, we know not what. With all his boasted supremacy over nature, this is a force man cannot control nor foresee. None can tell when the pent up agencies in the earth's interior may come to awful throes and find vent. The calamity brings home to us the fact that, after all, man is a puny creature, whose earthly existence may be ended in a moment. At one time the catastrophe is at Lisbon, at another on the other side of the world in Java, again it is at Ischia, on the coast of Italy, and now in this hemisphere. Critics have ridiculed the account the Bible gives of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, when "the Lord rained fire and brimstone" on those cities, but here is an awful proof that such destruction can occur. It does not seem so impossible as some are apt to think it, that the day may come of which the prophets have warned us, when such convulsions the world over may be simultaneous and this sin-burdened earth be given utterly over to destruction. Blessed, then, the man whose hopes and interests are not centred on this planet, but are confided to Him whose throne is in the heavens.

Praying for Riches

OUGHT a Christian ever, under any circumstances, to pray for riches? George Muller never prayed for riches; but he petitioned the great Banker of the universe to grant him means to carry on his Christlike work at Bristol, and the answer came in a golden stream from those whose hearts had been touched by his splendid Christian, self-denying labors for others. Dr. Cullis, of Boston, never prayed for riches; but he asked the Lord to put it into the hearts of the good people of the Eastern States to sustain his work, and they deluged him with gifts, until his philanthropies were increased tenfold. Spurgeon had a like experience, when he was struggling in the early stages of his great orphanage work. That glorious Christian, Barnardo, who has been made the means of social and moral salvation to multitudes of neglected children of the London streets and the English slums, never prayed for riches; but he fervently cried out to God for means to help rescue those wretched waifs from a fate worse than death, and his appeal was answered. Moody's grand Christian institutions at Northfield and Chicago were reared in answer to prayer for a supply of ammunition wherewith to fight man's worst enemies—sin and ignorance. Certainly such prayers should ascend; they are a test of faith in God's promises. When the last of our own resources is reached, then the great Giver of benefits, from his infinite opulence, will supply all we can ask or need.

But let none ever pray for riches for his own use, to pamper vanity, to indulge in pleasures and excesses, to gratify ambition and social display. For wealth for such purposes the Christian never prays, because he can find no justification for such petitions, and is tormented by no such desires. He holds wealth as a sacred trusteeship, and not as his own. He remembers the Master's repeated warnings against the inordinate love of riches, which is Satan's chiefest lure to destroy souls. He knows, too, that it is wholly unnecessary that he should pray for riches for his own use, since he is divinely assured that all his needs will be supplied. If God, who knows what is best for each of us, commissions any one for larger service, he never fails to give the means.

Why, then, should a Christian trouble himself about worldly riches? If he is "seeking the kingdom," his real treasure is not here. In all the category of godly Scriptural supplication, there is not one direct prayer for wealth; but there are many instances where the desire of the wicked for riches has been gratified for a season, only to become, ultimately, a snare and a curse to the possessor. The early Christians knew that wealth was a foe to spiritual growth, so many voluntarily took vows of perpetual poverty, rather than imperil their souls' salvation. And among our modern Christians, there are alas! only a chosen few who can stand the test of opulence without moral breakdown. Prosperity has killed its thousands; sudden riches has brought to many, not the happiness they had hoped for, but ruin for time and eternity!

When we pray, let us remember the beautiful petition of Agur, the son of Jakeh, "Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me, lest I be full and deny thee and say, Who is the Lord? Or lest I be poor and steal, and take the name of my God in vain."

The Spiritual Prism

A REALIZING faith is a faith which gives form and substance to things hoped for in the world beyond; which causes that God, the angels, the spirits of our departed friends, the heavenly mansions—all things invisible and spiritual—shall affect our hearts and influence our lives just as if they were seen and tangible—actually before our bodily eyes.

A ray of light passes through an aperture in your window and falls on the opposite wall. You see nothing there but a plain white image; your natural vision cannot realize the elements of which that ray is composed. But you take a little bar of clear glass with three equal sides and hold it so that the light shall pass through it, and instantly that ray is dissolved, and you look with admiration and delight upon the seven beautiful colors which the skill of the great Maker combined when he said, "Let there be light."

So it is when things unseen and spiritual are viewed through the medium of a realizing faith. The invisible world, with all the promised future, is no longer a dim, shapeless, shadowy mass of obscurity, but becomes at once a reality, every object of it, though only promised and still afar off, standing out as distinctly before the believing soul as if seen with the eye of sense.

India's Famine Not Serious

IN response to a cable message of inquiry, sent by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to Lord Curzon, Viceroy of India, relative to the reports that famine conditions worse than ever before were now prevalent there, the Viceroy cabled the following reply:

"SIMLA, May 8.

"LOUIS KLOPSCH, New York:

"Government of India are greatly obliged for your suggestion, but they do not at present stand in any need of assistance. People are not in state of serious distress. Ample relief is being given, and government resources, supplemented by existing private funds, are fully equal to strain.

(Signed) VICEROY."

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Triumph Assured

—HOSTS OF THE living God, march on! march on! His spirit will bless you. His shield will defend you. His sword will strike for you. March on! march on! The despotisms will fall, and paganism will burn its idols, and Mohammedanism will give up its false prophet, and Judaism will confess the true Messiah, and the great walls of superstition will come down in thunder and in wreck at the long, loud blast of the Gospel trumpet. March on! march on! The siege will soon be ended. Only a few more steps on the long way; only a few more sturdy blows; only a few more battle-cries; and then God will put the laurel upon your brow, and from the living fountains of heaven will bathe off the sweat and the heat and the dust of the conflict. March on! march on! For you the time for work will soon be passed, and amid the outflashes of the judgment throne, and the trumpeting of the resurrection angels, and the upheaving of a world of graves, and the hosanna and the groaning of the saved and the lost, we shall be rewarded for our faithfulness or punished for our stupidity. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, from everlasting to everlasting, and let the whole world be filled with his glory!

America for God

—GOD'S COUNTRY all the way past; God's country now. Put his name in your pronunciamentos. Put his name on your ensigns. Put his name on your city and State and national enterprises. Put his name in your hearts. We cannot sleep well the last sleep, until we are assured that the God of our American institutions in the past will be the God of our American institutions in the days that are to come. Oh, when all the rivers that empty into Atlantic and Pacific seas shall pull on factory bands; when all the great mines of gold and silver and iron and coal shall be laid bare for the nation; when the last swamp shall be reclaimed, and the last jungle cleared, and the last American desert Edenized, and from sea to sea the continent shall be occupied by more than twelve hundred million souls, may it be found that moral and religious influences were multiplied in more rapid ratio than the population. And then there shall be four doxologies coming from North and South and East and West, four doxologies rolling toward each other, and meeting mid-continent, with such dash of holy joy that they shall mount to the Throne—

And heaven's high arch resound again
With peace on earth, good-will to men.

Celestial Sympathy

—AS TO THE DRAMA of your life and mine, it will soon end. There will be no encore to bring us back. At the beginning of that drama of life stood a cradle; at the end of it will stand a grave. The first act, welcome. The last act, farewell. The intermediate acts, banquet and battle, processions, bridal and funeral, songs and tears, laughter and groans.

It was not original with Shakespeare when he said, "All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players." He got it from St. Paul, who, fifteen centuries before that, had written, "We are made a spectacle unto the world and to angels and to men." A spectacle in a Colosseum fighting with wild beasts in an amphitheatre, the galleries full, looking down. Here we destroy a lion. Here we grapple with a gladiator. When we fall, devils shout. When we rise, angels sing. A spectacle before gallery above gallery, gallery above gallery. Gallery of our departed kindred looking down to see if we are faithful, and worthy of our Christian ancestry, hoping for our victory, wanting to throw us a garland; glorified children and parents, with cheer on cheer urging us on. Gallery of the martyrs looking down—the Polycarps and the Riddles and the McKails and the Theban Legion and the Scotch Covenanters and they of the Brussels market-place and of Piedmont—crying down from the galleries, "God gave us the victory, and he will give it you." Gallery of angels looking down—cherubic, seraphic, archangelic—clapping their wings at every advantage we gain. Gallery of the King from which there waves a scarred hand, and from which there comes a sympathetic voice, saying: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Oh, the spectacle in which you and I are the actors! Oh, the piled-up galleries looking down!

Scene: The Last Day. Stage: The Rocking Earth. Enter: Dukes, Lords, Kings, Beggars, Clowns. No sword. No tinsel. No crown. For footlights: The kindling flames of a world. For orchestra: The trumpets that wake the dead. For applause: The clapping floods of the sea. For curtain: The heavens rolled together as a scroll. For tragedy: The Doom of the Profligate. For the last scene of the fifth act: The tramp of nations across the stage—some to the right, others to the left. Then the bell of the last thunder will ring, and the curtain will drop!

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Floods in Berlin

SIXTY years have elapsed since the German capital has suffered from the elements as it did recently. A heavy rainstorm, accompanied by thunder and lightning, broke over the city early on the morning of April 14, and continued with unprecedented violence till near noon. In those few hours nearly twice as much rain fell as generally falls in the whole month. Even after the heavy downpour, the rain continued, though with less violence. The streets of the city were turned into canals by the flood, making it look almost like Venice. The damage to property is estimated at several millions of marks. In the lower parts of the city the houses could not be reached except by boats. The lightning set fire to so many buildings that during the few hours that the storm prevailed the fire department received four hundred calls. Happily there was not a high wind, and the surrounding buildings were so saturated by the storm that the flames could not spread. The firemen did heroic service, and when the flames were extinguished they devoted themselves to the rescue of children and infirm persons who were caught in the streets and were in danger of drowning. Outside the city, the country also suffered. Silesia and Wurttemberg received the heaviest share of the deluge. Embankments and railroad tracks were swept away, bringing traffic to a standstill. Such experiences ought to teach men that, in spite of their boasted supremacy over natural forces, their control is far from complete, and that in spite of the effort to exclude God from his universe and resolve all his work into the operation of impersonal law, he is still Sovereign, and has forces at his disposal which can thwart the rebellious among his creatures.

It is he that buildeth his chambers in the heaven, and hath founded his vault upon the earth: he that calleth for the waters and poureth them out upon the face of the earth: Jehovah is his name (Amos 9:6).

Snowed Under

A journal published at Salt Lake, Utah, contains a thrilling story of an attempt to rescue an aged mountaineer whose cabin had been engulfed in snow. His companion, finding that their stock of provisions was almost exhausted and a heavy snowstorm impending, set out for the nearest town to procure food. He was only half way to his destination when the worst snow within the memory of living men set in. He dare not turn back, but it took him eighty hours to finish the journey. The snow fell so heavily that it was five feet deep on the level, and more than thirty in the drifts. Realizing that the old man would be in imminent danger, and that before he could be reached his slender stock of provisions would be exhausted, a party of five young men, equipped with snowshoes, shovels and provisions set out to rescue him. His son, who was absent when the news came, no sooner heard it than he, too, organized a party to work from the opposite end of the canon. Both parties are made up of strong resolute men, but there is great anxiety lest they may not be able to reach the old man before he perishes from cold and hunger. It speaks well for humanity that so many should be willing to go upon this mission without any prospect of reward, impelled simply by their desire to save one life. If men will do this, how much more reason is there for Christian men to band together to save a soul which is of infinitely greater moment.

If any of you do err from the truth and one convert him; let him know that he who converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins (James 5:19, 20).

As Christ Dressed

A dispatch to the New York Sun, from an eastern town, reports a singular departure from ordinary costume by one of its citizens. His dress was so remarkable that the reporter asked his reason for wearing it. In reply he made this statement: "As imitation is the greatest compliment that one can bestow upon another, I have dared, out of respect to Him and in accordance with what I consider the exalted and worthy promptings of my heart, to wear a robe or gown, either wine colored or white, and a yellow (gold) girdle. Religious costumes or uniforms of some sort are well known to most of the community, being largely used by officials in some of our churches. Strictly speaking they are not Christian, because in some of the most essential respects they are not like the pattern given by our great Prophet, Priest and King." To ordinary minds such imitation must appear puerile and liable to interfere with the usefulness that might be possible in less conspicuous garb. It was not such imitation as this that Christ desired, but imitation of his spirit and life, which does not depend on the clothing but on a change of heart.

Whose adorning let it not be the putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart (1. Peter 3:3).

Death's Harvest

Seldom have the deaths of so many prominent persons been chronicled in so short a space of time as were reported last week. Three men, each famous in his respective walk of life, passed away within a few hours. Admiral Sampson, our great naval hero, who had been ill for some months, died at his home in Washington on May 6. He was sixty-two years of age and had forty years had been read and admired by the English speaking world. His famous sketches The Luck of Roaring Camp, The Outcasts of Poker Flat, The Heathen Chinee, and The Tales of the Argonauts, had won the public taste, and they were followed by a long list of other works of great power. He had been in fairly good health save for an affection of the throat that was not considered serious. During a visit to the home of a friend in England, he was suddenly attacked by a hemorrhage and died in a few hours. Rarely has death reaped, in a few hours, three men so distinguished, but as experience has long since taught us, neither fame, nor power, nor wealth can deliver us from the last enemy.

Their love and their hatred are now perished, neither have they any more a portion in anything that is done under the sun (Eccles. 9:6).

BRIEF NOTES

The appropriation of New York City for education for the ensuing year is $20,215,388.

The annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions is to be held in Oberlin, O., Oct. 14-17, 1902.

The fiscal year of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions closed on April 30, with the gratifying report that it is out of debt.

The total number of Mormons in the United States in December, 1901, was about 310,000. This is an increase of 166,648 on the number in the census of 1890.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the oldest of the British missionary societies, had last year an income larger than in any other year in its history. It exceeded a million dollars.

The American Bible Society reports that during the fiscal year just closed, the number of volumes issued by the Society was 1,723,791, an increase of nearly 200,000 over the figures of the previous year. Its issues since the organization of the Society, eighty-six years ago, were 70,677,225.

Pastor Charles Merle D'Aubigne, writing on Protestantism in France, says that in 1835 Paris had only ten Protestant churches. To-day there are 105 in the city and suburbs. In 1857 there were only 738 pastors in France, now there are more than 1,200.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan has been conducting a course of meetings in Chicago, under the auspices of the Northfield extension movement. The subject for the morning was the "Crises of the Soul," and for the evening, the "Word of God."

Bishop Potter of New York, said in the course of an address a few days ago, that he learned during a recent visit to the West Point Military Academy that a large number of students had voluntarily organized Bible classes for mutual suggestion and edification.

The Student Summer Conference of members and friends of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Canada and the East, will be held at East Northfield, June 27 to July 6. Meetings will be held each morning and evening in the auditorium and at sunset on "Round Top."

MRS. SARAH J. BIRD, the Mother of the Bowery Boys, has received this letter, which she has forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "Enclosed please find check for $2 for Bowery Mission Work. You may depend upon me for same amount during the coming year. May God continue to keep and bless your work, and give you health and strength for every day, is the prayer of your sincere friend."

ADA M. CHAPMAN.

One of the first acts of General Palma in Cuba was to remove the remains of his mother to a decent tomb. Thirty years ago he hastily buried her when she died, a victim of Spanish cruelty, in an obscure cemetery in Bayamo, with a wooden cross to mark the spot. He and his friends have disinterred the remains, placed them in a stately tomb bearing a tablet with this inscription: "Candelaria Palma, whose beloved son Tomas has returned after thirty years and given her Christian burial."

served with distinction in the Civil War, before he was called on for his more famous service in the recent war with Spain. It was unquestionably due to his skill and consummate ability that Cervera was held prisoner in the harbor of Santiago, and though he was absent on other duty at the time of the great battle, the victory was due to the arrangements he had made for the eventuality. An unfortunate controversy arose about the credit due to him, and this embittered the close of his life, but it must have gratified him to know that his service was recognized and appreciated by the heads of the Department of the Navy, who were best qualified to judge of its value. On the same day died Archbishop Corrigan, the head of the Catholic community in New York. The archbishop was sixty-three years old and had held his conspicuous office for seventeen years. He had been ill for some weeks with pneumonia, but it was thought that he had safely passed the crisis of the disease, when he suddenly sank and died. The crowds that thronged the cathedral to take a parting look at his dead face, and the tributes of esteem which came from citizens of other creeds, proved that he was a man of high character, who had been generally respected. On the same day the news was published that another American of international fame had passed away in England. This was Bret Harte, the celebrated author. He also was sixty-three years of age, and for nearly

A Novel Educational Work in North Carolina

TRAINING THE MOUNTAIN BOYS

...Planting Seeds of Christian Character and Useful Lives...

ONE of the most notable features of educational progress in the South, is the Asheville Farm School, in Buncombe county, North Carolina, nine miles from the city of Asheville. It is conducted under the direction of the Woman's Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church. In no sense does attendance carry with it the provision that the students (all of whom are boys) must ally themselves with Presbyterianism. It is purely an institution for training boys to be the best sort of men, mentally and physically, yet conducted on high moral, Christian lines. Several States are now represented, but the majority of the boys are children of parents resident in the North Carolina mountains, where the population, being widely distributed, have but few educational advantages.

A NEW RECRUIT

These mountain regions are rarely understood by the occasional visitor. One sees a few homes, and, knowing nothing of conditions, forms a totally wrong idea of the situation. These may best be comprehended by contrasting the situation of to-day, with that which existed in early days in the mountainous regions of the Northeast, and is still to be found in some sections of the West. The settlement of the North Carolina and neighboring mountain regions, was subsequent to the Revolutionary War. Railroads are now comparatively near some sections, but much of the country is, and for many years will be, practically inaccessible, except to persons on foot or horseback. Under such natural conditions, educational advancement is difficult, except through outside sources, like the Farm School. The mountain people are of Scotch Presbyterian ancestry. Most of their forbears emigrated from Scotland after the battle of Culloden. The ravages of the British troops during the Revolution, drove the descendants of these immigrants into the mountains, and it is this stock that to-day is responding so splendidly to opportunities for advancement presented.

For one year's tuition at the Farm School the nominal cost is seventy-five dollars, which includes board and tuition—not tuition in the ordinary sense, but a training thoroughly calculated to fit boys for the practical walks of life—farming, mechanical or business, as well as to give the student a start in the attainment of the requisites of professional success. In some instances, where ready money is a scarce article in the family, only a portion of the tuition fee is paid in cash, the student earning the balance by work. Equal periods of daily work are allotted outside the class-rooms, and these are divided into inside and outside labor. The first includes cooking, cleaning, washing, mending, sweeping and other household details. In these tasks the boys are supervised by a matron, a cooking teacher, a dining-room superintendent and laundry superintendent—all women. There is no shirking or dodging work. Punctuality is enforced, and a delay of even one minute in reporting for duty will, unless explained, subject the delinquent to reproof. But these mountain lads are not lazy. Most of them quickly grasp the idea, that in order to keep in the procession of world workers it is necessary to do a thing both well and promptly.

Outdoor duty consists of seasonable work on the farm of 420 acres, 260 of which are in woodland and 160 under cultivation. Corn, wheat, potatoes and vegetables are raised; there is an orchard in bearing, and fruit trees are being set out yearly. One hundred acres of the woodland will be cleared, and the rest of the woods will be handled according to forestry principles. Last year's potato crop was 693 bushels (more than the school required), leaving a considerable margin for the market. Four hundred bushels was the total corn crop, just half the school requirement. There is a good-sized dairy herd, most of the cows being pure bred Jerseys, from the Biltmore estate, eight miles distant. Besides farming and the care of stock, the school has a dairy building, a carpenter shop, blacksmith shop, shoe shop and a steam power house. Instruction is given in practical mechanical work. The handsome home of Rev.

G. Sumner Baskerville, Superintendent of the School, was built wholly by the boys. One-half of the school quota, 150 boys, work three hours daily, from August to May, on the outside work at the school. During the summer from forty to fifty boys remain on the farm. Class-room work is suspended in vacation, and the boys who stay are those who in this way earn their tuition, enough to clothe themselves, and a little beside. Throughout the Western States may be found many young men who can trace their success to the Asheville Farm School.

Strict sanitary regulations, ample bathing accommodations, wholesome food and plenty of exercise keep the young mountaineers in vigorous health. In these days of the flocking of boys from the farm to the city, it is pleasant to note that so strong and steadfast a race of men as that bred in the Carolina and Tennessee mountains, is bent on achieving the advancement of their own territory, rather than on bending their energies to the success of other sections. There is always a certain percentage that will seek wider fields in other States, but the majority of the Farm School pupils believe that in their own part of the country lies a distinct future, if they will make it so.

One of the workers offered me the explanation of a mountaineer why the person blessed with an education could carry on a more successful work among those eager to learn than the native-born person, who, possessing full desire, lacked educational advantages. The man who spoke was of the stuff and measure of those who formed the skirmish line in the advance of civilization westward; rough in word and manner, but rich in intelligence and brawn: "I tell ye the reason weuns don't git ahead no mor' is that our preachers ain't no better 'n we be. First, they git liberty [the gift of speech], then they git license [the right to preach], then they git 'lected [chosen by a congregation]. They kain't talk to us no better 'n we kin talk to them. They don't know no mor' 'n weuns do."

It is the realization of this fact that is behind the desire for an education, so strong in the young mountaineers, and it is safe to say that not many years from now will see this cry from Macedonia answered to the full. CHARLES CULVER JOHNSON.

A CLASS OF ASHEVILLE STUDENTS AT WORK

CALLED HIGHER

His mother, Hannah Heitzler, "a member of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD family," writes of Eddie Heitzler, who died Feb. 7, 1902, aged twenty years: "My boy has gone home. Sweetly and calmly he bore his afflictions, saying with a smile to us who loved him: 'Don't cry. It is only a step to Jesus, and he can give me rest. He was continually asking his sisters to sing Gospel hymns for him, and he would join in as long as he could. Three days before his death, he sang 'There is Sweet Rest at the Master's Feet.' And his very breath went out with the words, 'O, Come to the Saviour, Believe in His Name,' which his pastor, at his request, was reading to him. I would be glad for his dying invitation to go around the world, so I send this account of his death to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Though he was so young, my boy was a winner of souls for Jesus."

In the death of Rev. Dr. H. A. Tupper, the South loses one of its best loved ministers and teachers.

For a number of years Dr. Tupper has held the professorship of Biblical literature at Richmond College. Up to four days of his death he had at his bedside for study the Bible printed in four languages. Dr. Tupper was seventy-four years old. He received his preparation for the ministry partly in Charleston, S. C., and partly in New York. His first pastorate was in Columbia, S. C.; his second at Washington, Ga., where he labored twenty-two years. The Foreign Mission Board of the Baptist Church South appointed him Secretary of the Board. He laid down this task to assume the professorship at Richmond College, one of the most notable Baptist institutions in the South. His wife, who was Miss Nancy Boyce of Charleston, before marriage, died in 1888. Seven children survive him. Two of these are ministers—Rev. Kerr Boyce Tupper, of Philadelphia, and Rev. H. A. Tupper, D.D., of New York, who is well known to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A TWENTY-THOUSAND-MILE GOSPEL TOUR.

BY JOHN WILLIS BAER.

TWENTY thousand miles of traveling, with meetings in every State and Territory west of Denver; going north into British Columbia and south to the Mexican line, has given me in the past three months a personal knowledge of the great West and its religious life, which has been inspiring and encouraging. I return to my home with a deeper spirit of consecration, a new-born desire for service, a wider horizon, and an enthusiasm that, please God, shall be permanent and abiding.

My mission was primarily in the interests of Christian Endeavor, though at the same time I represented the Presbyterian General Assembly's Committee on Evangelistic Work, and the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions. My itinerary had been carefully planned before taking the train from Boston, and I am glad to say that not a single engagement was missed and the train schedule was carefully followed from the beginning until the end. For weeks I was every single day in a different place, speaking on the entire trip on an average of not less than twice daily.

It was a privilege in almost every place to be greeted by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and in the name of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and my first duty then, it seems to me, on my return, is to accept the privilege of greeting the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and passing along to others something of what I have seen and heard.

I journeyed from Boston to San Diego, Cal., without a stop. In that garden city of southern California, the week of prayer had been continued, and the churches of the city were gathered afternoon and evening in these special meetings, which continued (so I was informed) for at least three or four weeks. Los Angeles, indeed the City of Angels, thronged as it was with Eastern tourists, was filled also with the evangelistic spirit, and special meetings were being held in most of the churches. Then, as I journeyed to Redlands, a most beautiful city of twelve years' growth, and to the oil centre in Bakersfield, and then on to Sacramento, and later to Fullerton, Santa Ana, Santa Paula, San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, Monterey, Santa Cruz, San Jose, Palo Alto, San Francisco, Oakland and Redding in California, covering, as I did, the great empire State of California, I had blessed opportunity to view the religious life in all altitudes, and under varying circumstances, and I rejoice to report that the Word of God is being loyally preached, and that the ministers and churches on the whole are hopeful and their work encouraging. Such centres as San Francisco have their own problems, to be sure, and peculiar to the great country surrounding them, and since the firing of Dewey's guns in Manila Bay, and the changing of the map of the United States, the entire Pacific Coast, centering in the "hub," San Francisco, has taken on new life commercially, and it seems to me that the churches have entered open doors, and have carried the cross of Christ forward with equal zeal and determination. It was a pleasure to visit such bustling cities as Reno, Nev., where the life centres in the mines of the mountains, to go to Salt Lake City, and to be in a ministers' meeting representing every denomination, and hear no uncertain protest to the extension of Mormonism, and an earnest plea to have the citizens of the United States interest themselves in a Constitutional amendment that shall prevent the practice of polygamy.

Preparing for the International Convention

At Denver, we were greatly pleased to see the city making preparation for the Sunday School convention, and at the same time the citizens pledged fifteen thousand dollars, and placed it in the hands of the Christian Endeavorers to help them secure the international convention of 1903. There was great rejoicing throughout that great country when, a little later, it was known that it was definitely decided that the next international Christian Endeavor convention should be held in Denver, in July of 1903.

Could you have seen the definite and aggressive work in Las Vegas and Albuquerque in New Mexico, cities that are blossoming into a permanent life, and being strengthened and tempered by the religion of Christ at the same time, and then to Phoenix, Ariz., a most beautiful winter resort, the climate unrivalled, it seems to me, in the West, in the winter time, where a thrifty city is reaching out, and making its influence count right and left, you would also thank God heartily, as I do. Everywhere I met ministers living the life of faith and battling with the strenuous life of the territory. And then, too, to think of what God is doing in Oregon! You have but to cross the great mountains of California, and slip into such a place as Ashland, a city of six or seven thousand, without a single saloon, to appreciate that there are men and women in these communities with convictions, and are willing to stand for them, too. And what can one say of Portland, with its magnificent churches and its splendid Sunday Schools and young people's work, with its intelligent and consecrated ministry, united as you seldom see the ministers of different churches, united shoulder to shoulder from all denominations, co-operating in an aggressive work.

In the Northwestern Gold Fields

Then to go to Tacoma and Seattle and up into British Columbia. It is this Puget Sound territory that is particularly awakening commercially on account of the opening of the great Alaskan and Northwestern gold-fields, their harbors filled with ships of commerce from every nation, their streets bustling with the activity of places as Missoula and Butte. I had not been in Butte for over eight years, and was not prepared for the transformation. Sometimes, those who do not know better, think of Butte only as composed of houses that are resting upon mountains that are undermined, as men dig for the ore, and that smelters blaze with stifling fumes, and that that is all, but when I tell you that chairs had to be brought into the aisles of a very large church on Sunday evening, and that fifty per cent. at least of the audience were men, you can understand me when I say that in Butte, too, the ministers are meeting the spirit of the times, and that the citizens, living a bustling and whirling life six days in the week, are ready to drink in the Gospel message on the Lord's Day. Butte, with its 30,000 people, is yet to be a religious as well as a commercial centre.

Idaho comes before my mind's eye with only pleasant memories; the city of Pocatello, a most important railroad centre, and on an Indian reservation, and growing very fast, and yet with every step of progress made the church keeps in the van. At Boise—and I saw no better city of ten thousand on my entire western travels than the capital of Idaho—I was impressed with the spirit of the ministry, of its definiteness, of its backbone, of its certainty that the Church had a message, and that woe would come to the minister if he did not preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ. I could stop and devote a column at least to each one of these cities and States and territories, and I feel sure would interest you, too, but in this rapid survey of our magnificent Western empire, I want the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to appreciate that God is carrying on a work of grace in the churches, that as the days come and go, is bound to win America for Christ.

A Contrast in Religious Life

As I contrast the Western religious life with the Eastern, I believe I do see a difference. The motive is the same, of course, whether East or West, but the method is different, and the Western men are adapting themselves with ingenuity to the local environment. There is a heartiness and a straightforwardness that is a comfort. These men do not idly dream, but fearlessly stand for the right. Then I notice, too, something that pained me a good deal—that there were a number of church members from the East, who had in the past few years gone to the West, to grow up with it, that had not yet taken their letters from their trunks, and were drifting from one church to another without locating definitely, and selecting a church home. This was about the only discouraging feature that I saw in church work. Some of our church members of the East, who have moved West, have postponed taking up their church life in the West, and I am ashamed to say, in some instances, all their religion, so far as any one was to judge, was in the bottom of their trunk. The ministers and the churches of the West appreciate this fact, and are particular and definite in their personal invitations, and I am confident that in the course of two or three years that "fly in the ointment" (and it is the only one that I can refer to), will have been wholly destroyed. The church buildings in the West as a whole are attractive, the churches in that way show their self-respect; the order of service inspiring and in some cases exceedingly novel, the music supplementing the preaching service always of high order and helpful. It was particularly gratifying to be in churches that at one time were dependent upon Eastern churches through various home missionary boards, that are now absolutely self-supporting in every particular, and doing their own missionary work at home and abroad.

Christian Endeavor is thoroughly alive and has become a recognized method of church work. The conventions, conferences and meetings crowded, and the enthusiasm deep and lasting. The Western churches are wise in making so wise an opening for this child of the church, and Christian Endeavor is "going and growing."

On my return from this campaign, grateful for what I have seen and heard, I want to extend my hand, figuratively speaking, again to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and to congratulate the paper upon its many readers throughout the great Western country. The paper is appreciated. Right and left I heard the earnest expressions for its management, its enterprise, and its missionary and evangelistic spirit. I now take up my work again greatly encouraged with the bright outlook for Christian work that I saw in the West.

genuine city life. Such a city as Seattle, for example, last year was enlarged by over five thousand different new buildings, and now has a population of one hundred thousand. And then to go to the Sunday evening services of the churches in Seattle and find them with auditoriums seating a thousand or more and crowded, you will understand, too, that the church life of these active and thrifty cities is not neglected. I have never been in better Sunday evening services than those that I have seen on the Pacific Coast, and especially in Seattle.

Then one goes through such cities as Everett and Spokane, the latter particularly a most beautiful city, with its fine public buildings and business blocks, and as you walk the streets you are reminded of the best type of the central Western cities. Then on to such

ACTS 14: 8-19 --- READ WHOLE CHAPTER

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- "THOU THEREFORE ENDURE HARDNESS,
AS A GOOD SOLDIER OF JESUS CHRIST." II. TIMOTHY 2: 3.

THEY shook off the dust of their feet against them." This was the farewell of Paul and Barnabas to the people of Antioch in Pisidia, for Jesus had said, "Whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart, out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet." Having thus testified against the city in symbol language, they took up their journey to Iconium, a city about one hundred miles distant. Their welcome and unwelcome there was like what they had received at Antioch in Pisidia. Some heard of Jesus gladly, others, particularly the Jews, were angry. The record is: "The multitude of the city was divided, and part held with the Jews, and part with the apostles." Feeling ran so high that Paul and Barnabas were stoned, and fled for their lives. Then they went on to Lystra, where the saying, "Vox Populi, vox Dei" ("the voice of the people is the voice of God"), had a most complete refutation. The whole incident is so dramatic we tell the story in that form.

Scene I. Paul and Barnabas reach the gate of Lystra, and see there a full length statue of Jupiter, the patron saint of the city. "Surely we are needed here," they say to each other, "to preach the true and living God."

Scene II. A public square in Lystra. Paul and Barnabas are preaching the Gospel to a company of Lystrians, among whom is a lame man, sitting where he is accustomed to beg. He listens intently. Paul observes him, and seizes the opportunity to corroborate his words about the true God by a miracle. Paul says to the lame man: "Stand upright on thy feet." To the amazement of the people, the man leaps and walks.

Scene III. Still in the public square. The cure of the lame man brings to the people's minds an oft-told tale that their gods, Jupiter and Mercury, had once come in human form to visit their country, and the promise that they will do so again. The people say, "Surely, they have come again. Let us do them honor by offering sacrifices to them." The priest of Jupiter himself brings oxen, garlanded with flowers about the head and throat, to offer as sacrifices to Paul and Barnabas.

Scene IV. Still in the square. Paul and Barnabas, seeing what is about to be done, rend their garments at the breast as a sign of grief, and rush in among the people, declaring they are not gods, but only men like themselves. The astonished people become quiet for a time, and Paul teaches them about the true God and his Son, Jesus Christ, who, indeed, was a God, come to earth to live for a while among men.

Scene V. Still in the square. The crowd of people has been greatly increased by the coming of other Lystrians, and by the arrival of some Jews from Antioch and Iconium, who speak against the apostles. Those who sought to worship the apostles a few moments ago now stone them. Paul falls to the ground, and is thought to be dead.

Scene VI. Streets of Lystra. Paul is being dragged to the city gate by the angry mob.

Scene VII. Outside the city walls. Some who had become the friends of Jesus are standing round about the prostrate form of Paul, supposing that he is dead. Suddenly he rises up. At first they are startled, but he is given strength of God to walk back into the city.

Scene VIII. Departing from Lystra. It is the morning after the sad day, and Paul, with Barnabas, neither of them disheartened, are starting to find in another city, Derbe, twenty miles away, another opportunity to preach the Gospel. They are bidden God-speed by a band of loving sympathizers.

Did they ever come back to Lystra? Yes, after they had preached to the people in Derbe they came to Lystra again, for they wanted to see how the friends of Jesus there were getting on, and to strengthen them. Two years afterward Paul found in Lystra one of his very best helpers, a young man named Timothy, whom Paul called "My own son in the faith," because he had led him to love Jesus. Timothy afterwards went with Paul to preach the Gospel, and to him Paul wrote our Golden Text, "Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ."

Illustration and Application

What does this Bible story principally teach?

1. Let us speak so as to make men "believe" on Christ (v. 1).
2. Let not our "perils among false brethren" upset our faith (v. 2).
3. He who works with God should fear nothing save failure in duty (v. 3).
4. Men divide on every moral issue. Am I on God's side? (v. 4).
5. It is a great folly to use stones in place of arguments (v. 6).
6. Strife in one field sometimes warrants change to another (v. 7).
7. The best "news" everywhere is the Gospel, the "good news" of Christ (v. 7).
8. "Faith cometh by hearing"—"faith to be healed" (v. 8-10).
9. It is a sin to give to any human being, much more to anything, the supreme devotion and obedience that belong to God.

The unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles (v. 2). "Think it not strange concerning the fiery trial that is to try you,"

"for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you." Paul knew his Old Testament too well, even if he had not been told at the beginning of his ministry "how many things he must suffer," to be surprised when bad men, aye, and religious men, antagonized his work. In the light of history a man may well suspect his fidelity who "hasn't an enemy in the world." Paul had bitter enemies, and so had Jeremiah and Daniel. Who that has been a real soldier of righteousness has not? Rev. Dr. W. J. Robinson once said that every theological student should lie in a tan-vat two months before he entered on his ministry, that he may not be "thin-skinned." Rev. Dr. George F. Pentecost said to a younger preacher, whose fearless preaching had aroused opposition, "If you are going to live earnestly you will have to make up your mind to stand the racket." And President Roosevelt, speaking of practical applications of Christianity, has said, "Reform is rough." Any one who aims to secure a change of heart or habit in others will meet resistance, for people do not like to be changed. Not alone preachers, but all Christians, have need of patience and persistence.

The Lord granted signs and wonders (v. 3). How these June days illustrate the glory of working with God! The farmer and the gardener long ago sowed the seed, but it would have been all in vain had not God helped them before and after by preparing the seed and soil and sending sunshine and shower. So in preaching and teaching and testimony, we are partners with God. He furnishes living seed in his Word, but we must scatter it. Then he helps again by adding his blessing that it may grow up into life. The contrast between the bare fields of January and the flowers and fruits of June is not so great as the changes wrought by the Gospel in joyless heathen lands, which it has made to bloom into happier life.

An agnostic who was once talking with King Kamehameha V., of Hawaii, asked him if things were not in a worse condition than before the missionaries came to the islands. The king answered:

"Why, sir, you have done three things since you came into my presence, which, but for the missionaries, would have cost you your life."

"What are they?" asked the astonished agnostic.

"First, you walked into my presence, instead of crawling on your hands and knees. You crossed my shadow, and you sat down in my presence, either of which offences would have been punished with death."

And the multitudes of the city was divided (v. 4). The truth divides men into friends and foes.

SOME asked for the continued in received it and believed filled with joy and the Holy OTHERS pake against truth; landered the preachers; welled with envy; turred up hatred; burned those who were ent of God.

They fled unto Lystra (v. 6). For a hero to run when nothing would he gained by staying, may take more courage in him than to stay and throw away his life.

What is it like in History? Paul proved that his flight was not cowardice by the way he faced dangers whenever duty called. Two stories of missionaries among lions in Africa, illustrate how Paul sometimes fled from and sometimes faced the "lions" in his way. In 1891, Mr. Ashe, of the Church Missionary Society, took to his African field a bicycle, to use in missionary tours. One day he was riding ahead of his porters, when he suddenly heard some great animals galloping at his side. A glance assured him that he was racing with three great lions. They had left a dead zebra, on whom they had been feasting, attracted by the wonderful wheel and a prospect of human meat. It would have been foolhardy to dismount and fight them, and so the missionary put his wheel to its utmost speed and they soon gave up the race. But, in another case, a missionary of the same society, Mr. Lloyd, was coasting on his wheel down a steep hill, when suddenly he saw, a few rods ahead, a huge lion lying across the road. His speed was too great to stop. On one side of the road was a high stone wall, on the other, a steep incline that it would be death to take. With swift decision, he saw there was nothing to do but go ahead, and so screaming at the top of his voice and clanging his bell, he dashed toward the beast, which raised its head, saw with terror this unearthly man of the wheel, and leaped aside, leaving just room enough for the missionary to speed safely by. It takes great presence of mind to know when to charge the "lions" we meet, and when to flee from them. As Pilgrim's Progress teaches, the lions in our way are divinely held back from really harming him who "keeps in the middle of the road," going straight onward, fearlessly, in the path of duty.

Stand upright on thy feet. In all ages Christianity has brought gladness to cripples, not alone by healing of the body, but also by giving rest and trust of soul even to the incurable. When a lady expressed her pity to a deformed boy who was pushing himself about on a wheel, he looked up smiling and said: "Wings some day." It is the crippled soul that should call out our greatest efforts. The papers recently reported from Cincinnati, the case of a man whose relatives and friends and the police had for years vainly endeavored to arouse to work. His sisters were poor, and yet he would not help to earn the food they provided for him. When they urged him to work and chided him for not doing so, he made no objection, but would never work. It seemed a case of insufferable laziness, and the police were appealed to, but in vain. At length, a young doctor in vestigated the mystery, and found it was a case of "lead paralysis," following a sickness due to lead poisoning years before. There are many such mysteries in the Church. What kind of paralysis is it that makes so many church members idle, when Christ is calling them to glorious work? Only by a divine miracle can they be made to "stand" and "walk" and work. Our chidings have failed to arouse them. Let us appeal to the great Healer to touch their palsied hearts and hands.

We also are men of like passion with you (v. 15). When we get at the real lives of great men, whether by intimacy or by the new style of biography, such as The Real Washington, we find they all have faults and foibles. Of One only can it be said "I find no fault in this Man." Jesus is "found alone." He, indeed, fulfilled the longing of the nations for a God to come down in the likeness of men. We may love others tenderly, but our supreme loyalty must be given to Christ in obeying his commands, rather than any other when there is conflict of authority. Our love for God is not the same kind of love as that of man for woman or of mother and child. It is the love of supreme loyalty that is due from us as the creature to the Creator which we are to give to God.

Certain Jews stoned Paul (v. 19). As the stoning of Stephen probably gave Paul his first impulse to be a Christian, so the stoning of Paul, probably gave Timothy, of Lystra, though nothing is said of him at this time, his first impulse to accept Christ and work with Paul. The words of the Golden Text, "Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ," which Paul wrote long after in a letter to him, doubtless brought back to both that scene at Lystra, when Paul's enemies thought they had "stoned him and his cause to death."

Instead of killing him, they had reinforced him with his best helper. So ever the stones hurled at martyrs, have become the cornerstones of new churches, and, like the stone of ancient legend, they turned to men as they fell. This Lystra scene was not alone one of the victories of peace—victories of the kind in which Paul is one of the world's conquerors—but it was also one of the victorious defeats—defeats turned by the power of God into victories—many of which are recorded on the pages of history, of which Calvary is chief.

Going back now to the healing work at Lystra, in that first missionary tour, we close with the thanksgiving Kipling put into the lips of Hindu women, for the medical aid Lad Dufferin gave to them in Christ's name, in two hundred hospitals and dispensaries:

If she have sent her servants in our pain;
If she have fought with Death and dulled his sword;
If she have given back our sick again,
And to the breast the weakling lips restored,
Is it a little thing that she has wrought?
Then Life and Death and Motherhood be naught.

Go forth, O wind, our message on thy wings,
And they shall hear thee pass and bid thee speed,
In reed-roofed hut, or white-walled home of kings,
Who have been helped by her in their need.
All spring shall give the fragrance, and the wheat
Shall be a tasseled floorcloth to thy feet.

"THE PRIEST OF JUPITER BROUGHT OXEN AND GARLANDS UNTO THE GATES"

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE VOYAGE OF LIFE

DURING the period of youth you are preparing for the longer and more important voyage of life which must be pursued in adult years; and upon your wisdom and discretion must depend the success or failure of your voyage. That voyage may be calm and peaceful, and filled with happy events; or it may be dangerous, and attended with many troubles and serious trials. And the results of that voyage must, in a large measure, be dependent upon your own exertions.

The first step in your preparation for the voyage of life should be the construction of a staunch and seaworthy vessel; the second, is the proper regulation of your course upon the broad ocean of time. At the very beginning of your preparation you will be confronted with an important and obtrusive question: How shall my vessel be constructed? In accordance with the plans adopted by worldly people, or by the safe and ever reliable plans laid before me by Christ? Your answer to these serious questions, and your action in the construction of your life-boat, will depend upon the estimate which you place upon two opposing, yet well defined principles—those which regulate the action of the people of the world, or those which shape the course of the disciples of Christ. You will either accept or reject Christ in the building of your vessel, and the regulation of your voyage of life, for there can be no middle ground. As between the people of the world and the followers of Christ, there can be no neutrals. For "he that is not for me is against me." You will, therefore, in the settlement of these all important questions, either ally yourself with Christ, and be guided by his safe course, and stay ever under his protection, or you will assume a position of open hostility to him, and, therefore, beyond the protective influences of his sheltering arms. You should weigh this important subject with the greatest care and maturest deliberation.

Observation of Christ's People

What are the merits of Christianity, and how do they appeal to me? How do the principles of Christianity compare with those applied in practice by the people who reject Christ? A close observation of the daily life and acts of both classes of people—those who accept, and those who reject Christ—will afford you an excellent opportunity to decide these questions in a practical manner, and upon their merits. A careful study of the New Testament will teach you the rules which should regulate the conduct of all disciples of Christ. Those rules define and regulate all human intercourse by the principles of love, virtue, justice, and truth, and require a strict obedience to the divine law. These principles of Christianity are fixed and immutable and admit of no deviation or exception. A true Christian will apply these principles rigidly and from a sense of duty and necessity. But people who reject Christ are bound by no such rules; they have no fellowship with him, and do not recognize the force or value of his teachings, but regulate their conduct solely by the standards adopted by the world. You can decide, therefore, whether you will cast your lot with people who regulate their course on the voyage of life by the safe counsel of Christ, who sail that wonderful and important voyage under the banner of the Cross, who regulate their intercourse with their fellow beings by the principles of love, duty, and good works, who are restrained in action by the rigid principles of Christianity, or are free to accept any course—however dangerous and unstable—or whether you will be guided by the wisdom and the examples accepted by unbelievers.

Well Defined Charts

As you prepare your craft, so you will regulate your course on the voyage of life. Sailors regulate their course upon the seas by well defined charts, which indicate the proper course, and the dangerous rocks or shoals, which are dangerous to the staunchest ships. This mode of navigation regulates a voyage by well-known facts, is safe, and wise.

The teachings of Christ constitute a safe and reliable chart for the regulation of the voyage of life; that chart indicates the course known to be correct and safe, and indicates the rocks and pitfalls which are hidden from human eyes.

You are preparing now for the voyage of life, and for the construction of the vessel upon which depend all your hopes and safety. Construct your vessel, and regulate your course, by the gracious plans and the chart bequeathed to you by Christ, as a precious legacy. They will serve as a safe and reliable guide for the construction of your ship, or the formation of your character, and the safe and reliable chart for the regulation of your wonderful voyage. They will comfort and protect you upon calm and peaceful waters, or upon roaring and tempestuous seas, and when your voyage is over, when the sun of time is set, and the darkness of endless night surrounds you, they will guide you into the safe and sheltered haven of endless peace and joy.

Profitable Reading

PROBABLY there never was so much reading done by people in general as there is to-day. To say nothing of the daily newspapers, which everybody reads, and which are so voluminous that their perusal takes a good deal of time and much thought, or at least much transient attention, there are the weekly and monthly magazines, and the output of numerous books. Every householder has, as a matter of course, his annual bill for literature, as for daily bread. Education is so widely diffused that we may be denominated a nation of readers. Time was that a few men in the community did the reading and shaped the public opinion. Now, there is not the remotest cross-roads in the least thickly settled region apart from the beaten thoroughfares, where the news does not penetrate, and carry its enlightenment with it. Fiction is spread broadcast, and the story-writer has it all his own way. Unless publishers can sell a novel to the aggregate of a hundred thousand copies, they shake their heads mournfully, and count the venture a failure. Yet we may not do ill to inquire what has become of the old, careful literary habit, which made many a plain man scholarly, and many a quiet woman intellectually rich forty years ago? Thousands of our rapid readers to-day cannot winnow the chaff from the wheat. Hurried reading for mere mental amusement, reading that makes absolutely no demand upon a person, except that he or she shall be superficially moved, is not profitable reading. It adds nothing to the soul's assets. It makes no man rich toward God or his fellows.

Mr. Carnegie's magnificent provision for libraries here, there, and everywhere, will not essentially change this condition, unless teachers and parents set themselves to raising a generation of really studious readers. We are catching everything, reading included, on the wing. We are not sitting down and reflecting, and assimilating what we read. A nation of mental dyspeptics, ignorant of the masters of literature and indifferent to their productions, may forecast a coming decline and downfall of national greatness.

WHEN THE DAY'S TASK IS DONE

WHEN the day's task is done
At the setting of the sun,
And the tired laborer goes unto wife and little one,
There is gladness in his heart,
He has filled a manful part,
And the night's reward of rest he has won.
When the life's task complete,
Kneel we at the Master's feet,
Then the guerdon of his blessing will be very full and sweet;
We shall rest with Him at home,
Where no tempests ever come;
And the scattered kindred there shall meet.

Broken China

Since nothing is more fragile than china, and dishes were known to be breakable, and we do not wish to use wooden platters nor iron pots, why should we so distress ourselves, dear sisters, over fractured cups and saucers. Women are absurdly annoyed when their dishes are nicked or cracked, or shattered by somebody's carelessness. Why cannot they be more philosophical?

A Parable

A little while ago the fields were naked, brown and sere. But underneath the bare stubble life was at work. Winter was merely a shield to protect the loveliness of the coming spring.

So may it be, when we reach the Father's house. We shall forget the grimness of the way. The storm, the cold, the darkness. For these are but preparing us for the bloom and the warmth. The gladness and the melody of the sweet bye and bye. Chill here, warmth there; death here, life there; partings here, meetings there, when the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

ALL NOW LOOKING TO MONT-LAWN

FRIENDS of little children of the poor are writing to this office many kind letters regarding our Fresh Air work at Mont-Lawn, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home on the Hudson. Their generous and faithful co-operation by gift, by words of encouragement, and by prayer, are more helpful to those who labor here for the waifs of the tenements than they can know. How much such aid means to the hapless little ones, who without the kind remembrance of God's people would suffer the whole hot summer through in their stifling, malodorous tenement houses, only those who have seen these wretched abodes can tell. On the one hand, we have letters like this from the children themselves:

Father is still not working. He goes every morning to look for work, but he does not find any. I have not had any shoes. I am so thankful you sent me a present, and that I am going to Mont-Lawn next summer, and that my brother and sister can come. It will help my father and my mother. Thank you for your help and for the good shoes. Your loving friend, FRANCES.

And this, badly spelled, but to the point:

Will you let us come to the country? We had such good times there. We haven't any fun and good times but there. Me littl brother is fore (four) now. Can I bring him? He'll be good. He's bin sic. I think he will get well up there. Me littl sister talks all day 'bout when we was up to the Home. Teacher put a good dress on her up there.

And then, strengthening our hearts and our hands, and enabling us to say "Yes," to many similar requests and to hundreds of petitions spoken by the pleaders who cannot write, we have letters like the following:

Unnamed, Monroe, La., $36 that twelve little children of the poor may be made happy for ten days at Mont-Lawn.—A. B. and J. T., Verona, Ill., $33. To be used for poor children—please send them to Mont-Lawn. We are so glad that we can make eleven happy with this sum!—A. R., Tipton, Mich., $3. May it bring joy to some little heart! a happy holiday at Mont-Lawn to some fragile little body!—Mr. and Mrs. C. J. W., Waterford, O., $3. To send some little child to Mont-Lawn.—Friend in Colorado, $9. To send three little children to the Home on the Hudson. Given in Jesus' name.

Many precious memorial offerings have been made to this work for the children of the poor:

Mrs. J. L. C., Elkhorn, Ky., $3. In memory of my little boy. I send it to be used in making some poor little child happy at Mont-Lawn.

Several friends who wish to support memorial cots during the summer, have asked the cost. Only $21 will sustain a bed there for the usual season, which is seventy days. During that time the cot can be called by the name of that one in whose memory it is supported. Perhaps there are others who would like to sustain "Thank-Offering Cots." Sometimes, generous souls are pleased to mark their own birthdays by the white stones of fair deeds of love; as this friend:

L. B. T., Sinking Valley, Pa., $3. A loving birthday gift "In His Name." May many little hearts be made happy this summer at Mont-Lawn, is the birthday prayer I give.

It costs so little to give ten days' happiness—and with this a chance for health, perhaps for life, to a waif of the tenements,—only $3 sends one child to Mont-Lawn for ten days, covering all costs of transportation back and forth; food, shelter, medical and caretakers' attention, etc.; $6 two; $9 three; $12 four; $15 five; $30 makes ten happy; $36 twelve,—a little colony. Will you help? All contributions should be sent to THE

CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. In order that written acknowledgments may be made at once, correct names and addresses of donors should be given. Help us save the children. When the hot days and nights come, the tiny crowded tenement room in which the family cooking, washing, ironing, and sleeping goes on, is almost insufferable; blistering pavements and sweltering courts (treeless, flowerless), are childhood's only playground; and little ones droop and die by thousands. This letter, from Miss Sophia Witter, missionary, with a number like it, has just been laid before the writer:

The children are besieging us to know if they can go to Mont-Lawn. As I have visited the poor and the sick, I have heard the plea on every side. A little girl writes to me: "I have been in the hospital the last three months, and the doctor says my mother must send me this summer to the country, where I can get the fresh air, or I can not get strong again, but mamma is not able to send me. My brother has been all winter in the hospital, too, and my little sister Mamie is not well. Please let me know when we can go?" A little sick boy asked: "When can I go to Mont-Lawn? The doctor told mamma I did not need medicine; it is the country I want." Another little lad who has been several times to Mont-Lawn came to me on Sunday, saying: "My sister Annie died last night." This little sister is the second child they have lost in this home within one week. The little boy himself, who is about nine years old, looks very pale and thin, and does not take much nourishment. In another family, there were five boys between the ages of two and ten, not one of whom has been well this winter, and the poverty-stricken mother is almost worn out taking care of them. All these children are looking forward eagerly to their visit to Mont-Lawn. They always enjoyed going there so much, as they could all five of them be together.

The Master said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these . . . ye have done it unto me." Kind friends who help us to save the children, will not lose their reward.

"Little Mothers" of the Poor * HOW A BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION AIDS OVERBURDENED CHILDREN...

A LITTLE MOTHER'S CHARGES

ONE of the most interesting forms of benevolence in New York City is that embodied in the Little Mothers' Aid Association, an organization with whose operations the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are not unacquainted. In fact every summer, several large delegations of "Little Mothers" are taken up to Mont-Lawn, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, and given long, happy outings there. Once, in the fall, the Home was kept open much later than usual, just that one hundred "Little Mothers" and their babies might have a much-needed holiday.

During the past several years, the work of the Little Mothers' Aid Association has grown very rapidly, it has a number of branches throughout the city. Mrs. J. H. Johnston is President, and Mrs. George A. Hearn, Chairman of the Sewing Committee, one of the busiest of officers. The work appeals to the heart of every loving mother, who knows the needs of helpless infancy, and the inadequate resources of many poor women, who must struggle to meet these needs, and to keep their children together. With meagre means at hand, the mother is compelled to go out and work day by day, in order to give her children food. She may be a widow; her husband may be squandering his earnings in drink, or he may be ill through misfortune, may be unable to obtain employment. Without the mother in the home, the care of the younger members of the family devolves upon the older sister. Often it is a child of ten or twelve years of age who takes the part of a Little Mother. The aim of the Little Mothers' Aid Association is to care for these children, to provide nurseries for them, and similar places, where the older sisters may come, bringing the babies, or toddling little ones along, and there receive themselves some opportunities, as instruction in spiritual things and training for domestic life. One of the most prosperous schools for teaching these poor little waifs, is located at 22 West street, and is called Pleasant Place. It is under the care of a member of the Association, Mrs. Margaret G. Low, a woman of wide experience in Christian work.

Every other Saturday afternoon she gathers together in her meetings one hundred children, and instructs them in the principles of temperance and in spiritual matters. Besides this, through the kindness of Mr. Fairbanks and Mr. Coy, she is able to supply all the needy ones with nice lunches of bread and cake.

The daily school is conducted by Miss Jeannette Olmstead. There are sewing, cooking, and other industrial classes, and a happy choral band.

The Association provides a room on Third avenue, one on Twenty-first street, a fine old mansion at 230 Second avenue, and Holiday House at Pelham. Mrs. Packard, Housemother at the Second avenue house, has long been connected with the work. It was she who brought forward the band of one hundred "Little Mothers" and their babies, who went up to Mont-Lawn. Besides taking care of the Little Mothers and their babies at these places, and giving spiritual instruction and industrial training, the Association sends into their homes many kinds of practical aid. The motto of the Little Mothers' Aid Association is: "Do all the good you can, to all the people you can, in all the ways you can."

Chapter XXVII

She Stoops to Conquer

THE girl had a conscience after all, though it was a tiny, undeveloped spark. Hilda was very, very unhappy (she assured herself) after Mr. Snider had taken his leave. She was aware, in a dim, uncertain way, that the impending decision involved issues, which loomed vast and unsubstantial before her frightened eyes. "Dear—dear," she sighed, twisting her white forehead into unbecoming wrinkles. "I wish I knew what to do." After awhile it occurred to her that she might call the Divine assistance into her counsels. To this end she pulled out her dusty little Bible and opened it with trembling fingers. "I'll just read the first verse I see," she said, "and take it for a sign. 'Melia says that's the way she always does when she can't think what to do.'"

She read and wondered, "And they put the two wreathen chains of gold in the two rings on the end of the breastplate." "Two chains of gold," she said aloud, "and two rings!"

She marked the verse and the chapter with red ink for further reference, her mind dwelling confusedly on the two rings. They might easily signify an engagement ring and a wedding ring—on the two ends of the breastplate. She wondered what a breastplate was. 'Melia would know. After all, the matter presently resolved itself into a series of simple questions. Which man was the handsomest, and which the most agreeable? After a short period of reflection she told herself that this was perhaps immaterial. Immanuel was "fascinating" and Jack was "nice." She would allow this to pass. She had already decided that a new house—Queen Anne, with a steep, red roof, or Colonial, with yellow and white paint—would be vastly preferable as a place of residence to the shabby little cottage on the back mill-road. "It would be awfully lonely here in winter," she thought with a shiver. Her grandfather had said she was not cut out for a farmer's wife. She was sure she was not. She simply could not imagine herself straining milk, washing pans or naking butter. She wondered if Immanuel would expect her to do these things.

She grew somewhat sleepy at this stage in her reflections. It was all very, very tiresome. She would go to bed, and perhaps in the morning she would think just what would be best.

There are visionary individuals who declare that while our bodies lie wrapped in unconsciousness our sleepless spirits wander free, and that these wanderings conform themselves to the last conscious reflections of the mind before it lays down its sceptre for the night. Be that as it may, the whole matter appeared absurdly easy to Hilda when her blue, fringed eyes flew open the next morning. She presented a ravishing picture as she lay on her white pillows, one round arm thrown up over her curly head, her lips faintly smiling, the curves of her fresh tinted cheeks as exquisitely perfect as those of a half-opened rose.

"I shall marry Jack," she said aloud. Immanuel must be informed of her decision. This would be a somewhat unpleasant duty, though Hilda regarded the breaking of an engagement as very simple, indeed as quite a matter of course. I shall be happier with Jack," she said to herself comfortably. "Besides, everybody breaks engagements—that is everybody who is pretty and has plenty of lovers. Amelia Hurd would not dare. If he should succeed in getting one man he would be lucky." These reflections passed in a casual current while the young lady was laying out divers sheets of tinted paper on which to inscribe the inexorable decrees of fate. Pale violet, she decided, with violet ink, was best suited to the subject matter in hand.

"Poor fellow," she sighed. "I am really awfully sorry for him. But I know I shall be happier with Jack. Jack isn't a bit tiresome, and I'm not afraid of him. I know exactly how to manage Jack."

It took a long time to write the letter; a number of crumpled sheets of violet paper found their way to the waste basket in small pieces before the square envelope was finally sealed and directed. No young woman acquainted with the rules of polite correspondence will suppose that Hilda Wilde was guilty of unmaidenly frankness. Oh, no, she regretted (sweetly) that she was so young. When one was so young it was difficult to know one's own mind. She had supposed that she loved Immanuel; but since she had come home she had thought long and seriously. She wondered how she could have made such a mistake as to suppose that she could be happy in the country. Grandpapa had warned her, and so had dear grandmamma and aunt Emmeline. Why had she not suffered herself to be guided by those older and wiser than herself? She was sure she did not know, but it was probably due to her dislike of causing pain to others. ("When I saw how you loved me I could not bear to disappoint you.") She hoped that he would forgive her and think kindly of her. She should always remember him, etc., etc. She signed herself, "Your broken-hearted Hilda." This hyphenated adjective might console him, she reflected, vaguely, and drew a sigh of relief as she laid a blotter on the last word.

On a sheet of cheerful pink paper she then inscribed a few words which would, she knew, bring Mr. Snider to her side with joyful alacrity. These two fateful missives then traveled in company to the village post-office, clasped in the daintiest of little white hands. The little hand dropped them softly into the post box, where they lay, the pink envelope and the violet, undisturbed for several hours.

Hilda was setting the last unhurried stitches in a bunch of blue forget-me-nots which adorned her latest "centrepiece," when Miss Amelia Hurd broke suddenly upon the quiet of her maiden meditations. Miss Hurd was flushed and breathless—which was exceedingly unbecoming, thought Hilda, disapprovingly. She wondered how she should feel if she had to survey such a purplish nose as Amelia's every morning in her mirror. The reflection brought a pitying smile to her lips. "Do take a fan, 'Melia dear," she said kindly, "you look so warm."

"I hurried," gasped Miss Hurd, laying her bony hand on her angular breast. "I was so excited! Read that, Hilda Wilde, and then tell me if you aren't the luckiest girl alive! I thought I should die when I found it! It came wrapped 'round a jar of butter."

"It" was a piece of soiled and crumpled newspaper, dainty Hilda touched it gingerly. "What in the world is it?" she asked composedly. "Dear me, how excited you do get, 'Melia; I never allow myself to—"

"Read it!" reiterated Miss Hurd, almost fiercely.

Thus urged, Hilda's blue eyes began to travel down the page; her friend watched her face with sparkling eyes.

"My, wasn't I struck all of a heap when I saw his name!" exclaimed Miss Hurd; "I was just going to stuff that paper into the kitchen stove, when the word Rossi caught my eye. Then I looked for the head lines, and there it was, 'Remarkable Caprices of a Multi-millionaire!' You could have knocked me down with a feather! Isn't it rich, Hil?"

Hilda's composed face had been undergoing a remarkable transformation while Miss Hurd was pouring out these disjointed sentences. Her blue eyes, wide with a sort of still terror, were fixed upon the page, her cheeks had faded rapidly from pink to white, and from white to a curious bluish tint.

"Why, Hilda Wilde, what's the matter? Aren't you pleased? I do believe you're going to faint. It was too sudden! I'll just run and get the camphor bottle. Lean on me, do, that's a dear! To think of my being the most intimate friend of a millionaire! You'll be going to New York, and—"

"Let me alone; do let me alone, 'Melia," gasped Hilda, pushing her friend away with a vigor which caused that young woman to stare with fresh amazement. "You stay here! Don't you follow me! I've got to go! Oh, what shall I do!"

Miss Hurd turned to the window just in time to see a flying cloud of pink drapery hurl itself out of the front gate. "Well, upon my word, I believe that girl has gone stark crazy. Did you ever!"

She turned with a foolish smile and picked up the piece of newspaper which had caused so strange an ebullition of energy in the tranquil Hilda. "It's him sure," she affirmed, ungrammatically, as her eyes devoured the close print: "Romantic history of a Dives, born a pauper—adopted by uncle—educated at Cambridge—passed quiet life unaware of his good fortune—astonishes New York with revolutionary plan to abolish slums—said to be summing in Sullivan county, near a village called Tacitus Four Corners."

"Of course it's him!" she repeated. Her eyes dwelt lingeringly on the final words of the paragraph: "In person Mr. Rossi is a magnificent specimen of American manhood; his dark complexion and eyes reveal the Italian strain in his make-up, while his tall, athletic figure gives evidence that in his case the best blood of three nations has united—the late Mr. Armitage being of English birth."

Hilda Wilde was making her way to the post-office as fast as her trembling limbs would carry her. She had but one thought, and that was undoubtedly a very foolish one. "If I can only get those letters!" The girl presented so pitiable an appearance as she showed her ashen face at the little square window of the office that the old postmaster took off his glasses and wiped them before he answered the question she could hardly bring herself to utter.

"I declare I hardly knew ye, Hildy," he said, kindly; "you ain't lookin' very well. Nothin' out the way, I hope, to your house?"

Hilda pulled herself together with a heroic effort. "No," she said, moistening her dry lips. "But I should like to know if the mail has gone out yet."

"No, not yet; I jes' got it into the bag. Job's comin' now to git it. Why? You got a letter you want to git off in a hurry? I don't mind openin' it fer ye, seein' it's you."

"Will you open it? Oh, Mr. Winters, how kind you are! Please do!"

"Wall, han' over your letter, Missy, an' we'll see. I'll bet it's to one o' them beaux o' yours; you guess he can't wait till nex' mail—eh?"

"No, it isn't that; it's only a letter—two letters I put in the box this morning; I've changed my mind about something, and I want to get them back. I must get them back!"

The postmaster paused with his hand on the lock. He shook his head slowly and screwed up his tobacco-stained lips. "I'm sorry I can't 'comodate ye," he said with professional dignity, "but we can't tamper with the U. S. mails on no 'count." "But it's only my two letters," pleaded Hilda, tremulously. "One is in a pink envelope and one in a blue; I could get them in just a minute. It wouldn't do any harm." Her color had come back now, and her eyes were never more dangerous in their soft brightness.

But Mr. Caleb Winters was, as he would himself have put it, too old a bird to be caught with chaff. He looked composedly at the sparkling, tearful little face and again shook his head. "Guess you'll hev to write by the evening mail an' tell 'em as how you've changed your mind," he remarked with aggravating cheerfulness. "Bless yer heart, they won't mind!"

"But they will! I can't do that; I must have those letters. Do you hear, Mr. Winters; I've just got to have them!"

The postmaster was displeased. He had daughters of his own; it occurred to him that he would shake the eye-teeth outen Sally if she talked to him that-a-way. "Here Job," he said shortly, "git erlong with this 'ere mail, and don't let the grass grow under your feet neither." With that he turned his broad back upon the suppliant, who had again grown very pale, and began fumbling with a pile of newspapers in the back of the office.

"Ain't you goin' to let her have 'em, pa?" whispered Job, a big-boned, hulking fellow of twenty.

"No, 'son; I ain't, an' I guess ye mus' be cracked to ask. What! tamper with the U. S. mails to please a chit of a gal? I'll bet I know which side my bread's buttered on fer a spell yit. Morn'n likely it's some smart trick of Dave Wilde's to git the office for himself."

Job turned away and shouldered the bag, but his eyes rested pityingly on Hilda's quivering face as he passed out.

In an instant she was by his side. "Couldn't you do it?" she breathed, as they turned the corner.

"Couldn't I do what?" asked Job.

"Open the bag and let me get my letters."

"I wisht I could, Hildy; I—I'd love to do somethin' fer you." The big fellow stared down at the lovely upturned eyes, with the most poignant regret depicted on his coarse-featured face. "But I guess pa 'ud kill me if I did. 'Sides, I ain't got the keys."

Hilda was silent for a moment; she was thinking fast. "Couldn't you—couldn't you get the keys?"

"I've had 'em in my han' more'n once," admitted Job; "but pa, he's got 'em in his pant's pocket now. I don't see how I—"

"You could hide the bag," whispered Hilda, "and get them afterward; couldn't you?"

"Golly, but you're a hummer!" ejaculated the young man. "What's in them letters that makes you so hot to git 'em?"

"They—they're business letters," said Hilda, blushing. "It will break my heart if I can't get them. Oh, Job, you have no idea how dreadful it will be! I'll give you most anything—yes, my gold watch I got last Christmas. I will; if you only—"

"I don't want yer watch, ner—ner nothin' like that; but I'll tell yer somethin' I would like."

"What is it?"

"You're so terrible high an' mighty, Hildy; I ain't never got a word with you, hardly," said the young fellow in an aggrieved voice. "When we was playin' snap an' ketch 'em once a long time ago; don't you remember? you wouldn't let me kiss you when I ketched you. Now, ef you—ef you—"

"Well, what?"

"Ef you'll let me kiss you—none of your cheek kisses—but right smack on your mouth, I'll git them keys an' give you them letters."

"How will you do it?"

"Never you mind, no letters, no pay; is it a go?"

Hilda looked down upon the ground; a burning wave of color spread itself over all her fair face and white neck. "I'll give you ten dollars and my gold bracelet," she murmured, "if you—"

"No-sir-ee! I'll do as I said er I won't do nothin'. Do you want them letters?"

"Yes—oh, yes!"

"Will you pay fer 'em as I said?"

"Yes," said Hilda, in a low, shamed voice. "I will."

Premiums Beyond Expectation

Mr. Albert Dow, Glendale, Cal., writes: "I acknowledge receipt of the beautiful premium pictures, and must say that they are far beyond my expectations. I have received premiums from other publishers, which apparently have been over-rated in their prospectus, but perhaps I anticipated too much. You certainly have given me not only full measure, but running over. I hope your business will exceed your anticipations, both in good to others and in abundant financial returns to yourself and associates. The Red Letter Bible was received in good order and is very satisfactory."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Better Way

THE ideal life, as most men and women think of it, would be one utterly free from all claims upon time and resources which would check its movement, dwarf its growth, or impede its swift and orderly progress. Most of the rebellion against our circumstances arises from the feeling we have that they restrict, limit, and narrow us; we should like to be set free, and we fancy that if no responsibilities or duties were imposed upon us other than those we choose for ourselves, we should move swiftly and irresistibly forward, accomplishing all our purposes and turning all our dreams into facts. But the divine way of obtaining freedom is very different from the human way. There is no truth which men and women accept so slowly and with so much pain of heart and mind as the truth that freedom comes through patience, and that our life gets its richness and strength, not by working itself out according to our plans, but by submitting itself to the direction of another. Every one of us has some little structure which he would like to complete for himself, laying the foundations, building the walls, spreading the roof, and adorning it without and within according to his own design. But God sets us at work upon an edifice so vast that our work upon it is only a small detail, and we are such inferior artists that we would prefer to be the architects of the small design rather than the builders of the great temple. There is not one of us upon whom some kind of restriction is not laid; not one of us whose free, spontaneous movement of life is not checked by the weakness of some other whose work we add to our own. While we are doing the work of the day with all our might and with entire success, some one else near us falls by inefficiency or by positive evil of nature, and we are obliged to stop and add his load to our own. Instead of doing the thing we would like, which would bring completeness to our life in our eyes, we must pick up a wearisome burden that has no inspiration in it, and carry it with a constant fear of loss. Many a woman's life would be far richer in her external activities and opportunities if she were not taking upon her own shoulders the deficiencies and weaknesses of others. Many a man would have larger education, more congenial social surroundings, a sweeter life, if it were not for the responsibilities he assumes for those who are unable or unwilling to meet their own responsibilities. There are times when the best nature revolts against this apparent waste; and yet it is precisely through this discipline that men and women are molded into nobler spiritual stature; it is by patient submission to restriction, by cheerful bearing of the burdens of others, by uncomplaining acceptance of conditions imposed upon us by the weaknesses and sin of those that we love, that the truest liberty and the most enduring strength are won. Christ's life was the very opposite of that which, from any human conception, a divine nature would seek for itself; and yet it is plain that its highest divinity lay in its cheerful surrender to the hardness and barrenness of human conditions. He came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and he saved his life by losing it.

Facts About Poultry

POULTRYMEN and incubator and brooder manufacturers are following the example of seedsmen and florists in sending out annual catalogues of valuable advice and information about the products which they handle. The following can be had by addressing a card to the publishers:

"All Right" Incubators and Brooders. Everybody who raises poultry is interested in information about the working of the modern machines which "take the place of the best old hen at her best—in fact, of many good old hens at their best," for there are incubators which hatch 200 or more chicks at a time and brooders which mother feathered multitudes. Last year, the grand total of the poultry industry was nearly $400,000,000; and this, divided by the population of the United States, would average about $5 to each person. The modern incubator and the brooder which have helped to bring about such results, are fully treated in this pamphlet. Pp. 48. Clay Phelps Incubator Co., Cincinnati, O.

Shoemaker's Poultry Almanac for 1902. This illustrated pamphlet, besides being a good calendar, describes the different breeds of high-class fowls, with advice as to which are best for various purposes—that is, as layers, sitters, mothers, and toothsome meat for the table. Directions for feeding and general care are given. A number of pages are devoted to a profitable discussion as to the best way of using artificial incubators and brooders. This book will be found helpful by any one raising poultry, whether on a large or a small scale. Pp. 161. C. C. Shoemaker, Freeport, Ill.

Greider's Illustrated Catalogue. Every chicken-fancier should have this on his book-shelf. The catalogue is instructive, useful and pretty. The publishers have been for years expert breeders of fine poultry; and are thoroughly competent to give first-class advice and information upon the subject of chickens, ducks, turkeys and geese. Members of the feathered tribe—from the stately, big Brahma or Langshans, to the pert, diminutive Bantam—find pictured presentation in these pages. B. H. Greider, Florin, Pa.

A YOUTHFUL CUBAN MISSIONARY

THE bright young girl whose picture appears with this, is an earnest Christian worker in Havana. The story of her consecrated life and her present activities may be interesting to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: Her father, Rev. Dr. A. J. Diaz, relates that some ten years ago a professional kidnaper came into his house one evening in Havana, Cuba, while he was sick in bed, and taking the little girl, Esther, in his arms, ran down-stairs and out into the street, hiding as he ran in the shadow of the large stone columns over the sidewalk. The mother, however, caught sight of him, and called loudly to her sick husband, "A robber is carrying off Esther!" Springing out of bed, he ran down-stairs, following the cry of his little girl in the distance; when he came up with the man, he caught the child's frock and tried to stop the man and get her away. When he found he could not do so, he says, "I struck him behind the ear and he lay down. Then I took my little girl back to her mother, and returned to my bed exhausted, as I had had the fever some days and was very weak. This man had carried off the child, hoping to get a reward for bringing her back, a thing which was of common occurrence in Havana about ten or fifteen years ago."

Esther is attending school with the idea of fitting herself to be a teacher; and is even now a great help to her father in church and mission work. She plays the cornet and leads the singing in his large church and Sunday School, and in his services. As far as I know, she is the only Cuban girl who has learned to play the cornet; she has done this, as she says, "to help father carry on his work." She is teaching in his Sunday School, and is an active member of the Iglesia Bautista Getsemani, of which Rev. Dr. A. J. Diaz is pastor.

A Great Model of the Temple

MR. WALTER WILLIAMS, editor of the Columbia, Mo., Herald, member of the Board of Curators of the State University of Missouri, superintendent of one of the largest Sunday Schools in the country, now traveling in the Old World as the representative of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, writes from Jerusalem under date of February 24, as follows:

"I have secured from Dr. L. Schoenecke of Jerusalem, the promise to exhibit at the World's Fair in St. Louis the world-famous models of the Temple of the Jews, models prepared by his father-in-law, the great scholar, Dr. Schick, and perfected by himself. Efforts have been made to secure these models for use at other Expositions, but so far entirely without success. Some thirty odd years ago there came to Jerusalem, a German archaeologist, Dr. Schick, who thenceforth made the temple area his life-study. Last December he died, and the fruits of his life-work are to be seen in the fine models, made of thousands of pieces of wood and showing the various temples, as this learned scholar believed them to be. Dr. Schick has reproduced with marvelous ingenuity all the Temple buildings, and the beautiful models show the result of intelligence, patient industry and profound scholarship."

A Historic Church Renewed

For its reopening services, the famous old M. E. Church at Flanders, N. J., was beautifully decorated with flowers and potted plants; and through the new stained-glass windows, the light fell softly on a happy people. The church is one of the oldest in Eastern, N. J., dating back to 1783, when Mary Bell, a refugee during the Revolutionary war, fled from New York City, where she had lost her home and suffered many hardships, to find asylum in this locality, where she was the first Methodist, and therefore may be called founder here of the Methodist Church. The first edifice used, now 113 years old, is still standing. The present building, erected 1857, was closed for several months for repairs. Then about the pastor, Rev. Joseph R. Heard, gathered brother pastors and evangelists and all his people, and the old church, made fresh and beautiful, was opened. Three of the windows are memorial windows; the Epworth League, Ladies' Aid Society, and several Sunday School classes have windows; one of the latter is placed by the joint classes of Mrs. Emeline Martin and Miss Garetta Van Dyke, the latter being the oldest living member of the Church and Sunday School. The rehabilitation throughout has been a work of love and pride; and no debt for improvements hangs over the sacred building.

I MUST ABIDE IN THEE

O FATHER, help thy troubled child,
So spent—so tempest torn;
I cannot bear the storm so wild,
By every wave up-borne,
Be thou my Refuge and my Tower,
To which my soul may flee;
In every troubled, trying hour,
I must abide with thee.

Life has such strange vicissitude,
Such fiercely rending gales,
Such blinding storms—such lashings rude,
I cannot trim my sails,
Oh, I shall perish here at length,
Wrecked in the yawning sea,
Unless thou, Lord, wilt be my Strength,
And come, abide with me.

I cannot be the sport of waves—
Of every eddying tide,
I must find power that helps and saves—
I must in thee abide.
Speak peace, and make my peace secure,
Whatever else must be;
My anchor must be strong and sure—
I must abide in thee!

Puerto Rico's New Bishop

THE Rev. James H. Van Buren, recently elected the first Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Puerto Rico, is admirably fitted for the position and has already exerted a strong influence in the educational and religious affairs of the island. He came to Puerto Rico on Feb. 14, 1901, and has succeeded in building up a strong church organization in San Juan. His church society has purchased a large building site in the heart of the city and will erect a fine church edifice. The new Bishop's warmest coadjutor is his wife, who has entered heartily into all his plans. Bishop Van Buren was born in Watertown, N. Y., July 7, 1850. He prepared for college at Cincinnati, O., and went thence to Yale, where he was graduated in 1873. He was ordained as a deacon at Berkeley Divinity School, in 1876, at Middletown, Conn. He has held several important rectorships. He was married in 1877 to Miss Anna M. Smith, of Norwalk, Conn. Bishop Van Buren is a successful author, his works including stories, histories, a translation from the Latin, sermons, essays, and poems.

Strange Names for Children

A correspondent of the New York Sun, in Reading Pa., writes: "Ananias Shoemaker, aged 71 years, died at Henningsville, Lehigh County, lately. He was a retired farmer. When they were young men, he well knew Cain Minninger, in Earl township, who died a short time ago. Farmer Shoemaker was a reputable and truthful citizen despite his first name, and Mr. Minninger was a gentle and inoffensive man. The deaths of these aged men and their first names have called public attention to the fact that Biblical names are often chosen by parents for their children without regard for their association in Holy Writ. Cain, Ananias, and even Judas Iscariot were used. Preachers are gradually putting a stop to this. One clergyman said: 'Only the other week I was in the hills of Earl and was called into a backwoods cabin to christen a bright infant boy Judas Iscariot. I asked the father why he had selected such a name and he replied that it was in the Bible. After a little reasoning with the parents they decided to name their boy Silas. I think these names are gradually going out of style. Things are constantly changing, and with them all christenings are no exception.'"

FAT VS. BRAINS.

Food That Makes Brilliant Newspapers.

Nervous prostration cannot continue if the right kind of food is used, but food that will build fat does not always contain the elements necessary for rebuilding the soft gray matter in the nerve centers.

A lady tells how she got well from using Grape-Nuts Breakfast Food. "I was treated by several physicians at the hospital. My disease was pronounced neurasthenia (nervous prostration). The doctors gave me various nerve tonics without producing any beneficial results. I finally got so weak that I could not work either physically or mentally. About two years ago I began the use of Grape-Nuts and a marked improvement set in at once. In eight weeks I had regained my strength and could do my old work even better than before, that of writing for the press. All honor to Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

CHRIST'S PURPOSE*

Quickened and Imparted Life, Developing and Continuing Forever, the Gift of Christ * * * *

LIFE and character are often misunderstood, because men do not know the purpose others have in view.
The story is told of a working tailor, that he was called mean and stingy by his fellow-workmen, because he would never join them in spending money for beer and pleasures. They despised him and hated him, and called him a miser, and other opprobrious names. But one day it was accidentally discovered that he had an aged mother and a crippled sister whom he was supporting by his earnings. That discovery changed completely the estimate of his character. When they knew why he economized they honored him for it. An English traveler in Eastern Africa was similarly misunderstood. A number of slaves had been stolen from the interior and brought to the coast. One of them showed unusual intelligence, and protested loudly against his being sold.
Sympathy for him was felt by many spectators, who declared they would not be parties to the outrage of enslaving a man of his standing. The captive listened and respected them. At last the Englishman bid for him, and finally became the purchaser. Murmurs were heard all around, and the captive himself joined in them, at a man belonging to a nation known as an opponent of the slave traffic, purchasing him, when others had shown their indignation by holding aloof. But no sooner had the Englishman carried him on board his vessel, than his purpose was discovered. The man was set free.

Christ's mission to this world has often been misrepresented. Even in his own time and in his own benign presence, he was called a wine-bibber and a friend of publicans and sinners. It is well for us that he, himself, defined the object of his coming. He came to save the lost, to give life, and to give it ever more abundantly.
There are many degrees of life. A poor little cripple was seen one day among a crowd in a great city, selling papers. A tall, kindly, sweet-voiced man stood watching him. Presently, when the crowd had dispersed, he went over and spoke to the lad, asking him about his affliction. He soon understood the nature of his complaint and, taking the child to a hospital, performed an operation which restored the crippled limb to its normal state. It was like new life to the boy to be able to run around like other children. But his skilful friend had not done with him. He had taken a liking to the child, as a man is apt to do when he has rendered a service to another. He sent him to school, and the boy's mental powers were developed. A whole world of knowledge of which he had previously had no conception was opened to him. The new life was becoming more abundant. The boy showed a taste for art, and his patron had him taught and finally sent him to Europe to study under the most famous masters.
That was another stage in more abundant life. His story was told to a wealthy friend of his patron and elicited so much sympathy, that an interview was arranged which led to a friendship and eventually his adoption by the millionaire, and in a few years the once crippled waif of the street was the owner of a large fortune, able to gratify his esthetic tastes and become the benefactor of others. The life had become still more abundant.

The Jewish aristocracy resented the way Christ had of going among the poor and the despised. He chose his associates from among that class. If any prominent teacher now were to do so, he would excite similar censure. Imagine a preacher now entering one of our cities, attended by a group of common laborers and fishing-folk, and spending all his time in the slums. The "better classes" would be likely to leave him severely alone.
Christ's explanation was simple and logical. He came to save the lost, so he went where they were to be found. But the higher classes were not excluded if they wished to share in the blessing. Those who had life might come to him and have it more abundantly. He could not only enrich and develop the life here, but he could endow it with perpetuity, so that reaching the grave it passed through it, emerging triumphant and renewing its development on the other side. What a magnificent mission! And it still goes on.

The poor creature who is a slave to sin and to the bondage to evil habits and lusts, whose real life is such a feeble flickering spark that people doubt whether it exists at all, comes to him now and finds new life. The real life, that which will go on when we have done with business and money-getting and pleasure and pain, is increased and multiplied. Not only and not chiefly does Christ take away sin and its punishment; he so strengthens the divine life within by imparting the riches of his own nature, that the man who submits to him is filled with it and turns with loathing from the husks that once satisfied him. He becomes a new man, he has a new birth into a new life and that life is ever becoming more and more abundant.

An Artistic Appreciation

Jennie M. H., Folsom's Find, near Buckland, Dak., writes: "The Art Portfolio was duly received, for which please accept my thanks, appreciation of the works of art, 'The Soul's Awakening,' with its inspirational expression, being in itself high compensation as premium. Copied, as these pictures are, from masterpieces, they form fine studies for an artist, valuable adornment for library or niche, delights for decoration in many cozy home apartments. In a word, they stereotype the caste of Christianity sustained in THE CHRISTIAN

GAS FACTORIES

In People Who Do Not Know How To Select Food and Drink Properly.

On the coffee question a lady says, "I used to be so miserable after breakfast that I did not know how to get through the day. Life was a burden to me. When I tried to sleep I was miserable by having horrible dreams followed by hours of wakefulness. Gas would rise on my stomach and I would belch almost continually. Then every few weeks I would have a long siege of sick headaches. I tried a list of medicines and physicians without benefit.

Finally I concluded to give up my coffee and tea altogether and use Postum Coffee.
The first cup was a failure. It was wishy-washy and I offered to give the remainder of the package to anyone who would take it.

I noticed later on in one of the advertisements that Postum should be boiled at least 15 minutes to make it good. I asked the cook how she made it and she said, 'Just the same as I did tea, being careful not to let it steep too long.'

I read the directions and concluded Postum had not had a fair trial, so we made a new lot and boiled it 15 or 20 minutes. That time it came to the table a different beverage and was so delicious that we have been using it ever since.

My sick headaches left entirely as did my sleepless nights, and I am now a different woman." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

HONORING GOD

Preachers who Would Not Accept Credit that Belonged to God

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

It is not by accident, it is not by the power of man, but by the working of the Holy Ghost when the Word of God is so spoken as to make men believe. How often, when men pin their faith to a man who has once been greatly used; and they expect the same power in him which was formerly manifest through him; they are disappointed! God will not let the glory be given to man which is his alone.

The power of God, which was upon the people of Iconium (Acts 14:2), did not hinder, but provoked, persecution. "The Jews that were disobedient [or unbelieving] stirred up the souls of the Gentiles, and made them evil-affected against the brethren." It is no wonder that natural, unregenerate men, persecute those who are born again of the Spirit. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Nothing in his experience answers to that which spiritual men speak of; they testify, not to an opinion, but to a life, to which those are strangers who are not born from above (John 3:3, margin); and it is only when they are convinced by its fruits that this life is of God, that they do not possess it, that they will seek after it for themselves. This no man will do who is completely satisfied with himself; and this is the condition of a large number of those who are unsaved, and especially among the religious unsaved. But it is the life of God, the Holy Ghost in God's people, which convicts the world "of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment" (John 16:8).

The words are significant, "Long time therefore they tarried there." They did not run away from the opposition and slander which assailed them; they did not think the fiery trial which was to try them a strange thing; they did not look for an easy place of work; but accepted as their portion fellowship with Christ's sufferings. They continued "speaking boldly in the Lord, who bare witness unto the Word of his grace, granting signs and wonders to be done by their hands." This was according to the promise of Mark 16:15-18; and the same experience was granted them which was granted to the company of the first disciples at Pentecost (Acts 4:29-31), when they prayed for boldness to speak the Word, by the promised stretching forth of the hand of their Lord to heal, and that signs and wonders might be done in the name of God's holy Child or Servant Jesus (Acts 4:29, 30). It was now some thirteen or fourteen years since the time of that prayer at Pentecost, and God's answer to it, in granting that by the hands of the apostles many signs and wonders should be wrought, and multitudes of believers added to the Lord; when the work of healing went alongside the preaching of the Word, so that they brought the sick into the streets, and many of the sick from the cities around Jerusalem were brought hither, "and they were healed every one" (Acts 5:12-16). After the lapse of these years, we see signs and wonders as much connected with speaking the Word with boldness as at the first. Paul, the learned disciple of Gamaliel, needed this witness of God to his preaching as much as the unlearned and ignorant fishermen apostles who came from despised Galilee; the Bible-instructed Jews needed these "signs" as much as the heathen around them.

At last things came to a crisis: "the multitude of the city was divided; part joined with the Jews, part with the apostles." Finally, the party opposed to the truth of God commenced using personal violence against Paul and Barnabas. This was the sign that God would have them flee to another city, according to Matt. 10:23. Therefore they fled to other cities of Lycaonia—Lystra, Derbe, and the region round about, not to remain in silence and a fear, but there also "to preach the Gospel." The time of open persecution of the teachers is always the proving-time of the new-made converts. "For there must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you." (1. Cor. 11:19). God is responsible for all which he permits. When he takes away the leaders from a church, he leaves him who shall guide his children into all truth. God can trust converts to the Holy Ghost: this, man can very seldom do.

At Lystra the enemy was busy: he stirred up his creatures to exalt man, and put into the mouths of the heathen multitude the cry, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men." Satan knows that where man is exalted, there divine power must retire. Thus he seeks everywhere to exalt man. If there is a great spiritual awakening, the preacher has done it; and too many preachers accept the credit only too willingly. Here the insult of Satan to God was especially marked.

A Dinner-Hour Sermon

In various parts of the United States, men engaged in Christian work have undertaken to carry the Gospel into the workshops and factories. Several instances of this novel form of evangelistic effort have already been described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Similar methods are now being adopted in England, a notable example being that of Archdeacon Wilberforce, of the Anglican Church, who has control of Westminster Abbey. At present the Abbey is in the hands of an army of workmen, who are preparing it for the coronation ceremonies. The

PREACHING TO WORKMEN IN WESTMINSTER

Archdeacon persuaded the men to give up twenty minutes of their dinner hour to attend a short service in the cloisters. As a general rule, the workman and his pipe are inseparable, but it should be stated to the credit of the mechanics at the Abbey, that whenever the Archdeacon—who conducts these twenty-minute services personally—opens his lips in prayer, the pipes are discarded, caps are pulled off, and heads bent reverently. The service is a very simple one. A hymn is sung, the Lord's Prayer is repeated, and then follows a brief address, in which the illustrations are drawn by the speaker from the history of the famous old Abbey and the great men who are buried within its hallowed grounds.

SHIPPED ANYWHERE ON
We will stop any Piano or Organ upon the distinct understanding that if not found entirely satisfactory after 12 months' use we will take it back, thus giving you one year's free trial in your own home. You take no risk when you buy on the celebrated Cornish Plan. It is the only way. If as good pianos and organs could be bought anywhere else for as little money, we could not afford to make an offer like this, but we'll go further. In proof of this statement which may to some appear extravagant, we give to every purchaser a guarantee that is practically a bond secured on the whole of our plant and property, worth over ONE MILLION DOLLARS, warranting each instrument sold to be exactly as represented. Furthermore the Cornish American Pianos and Organs are far better in quality and general appearance than instruments offered for sale by any other firm of piano and organ manufacturers, or any

A CHRISTIAN COUPLE IN FEZ

GENERAL VIEW OF FEZ, THE SULTAN'S CAPITAL

TWO NATIVE EVANGELISTS

MOROCCO'S YOUTHFUL RULER

Abdul Aziz, the Leading Reformer in a Land of Slavery, Superstition and Cruelty

By Rev. Fred Weiss, Missionary in Tangier

MOROCCO is a land where the ways of life are the same to-day as they were a thousand years ago; a land wherein man may still be the slave of man, and where woman is no more than a creature of man's passions. The present Sultan, Abdul Aziz, is in favor of reform, and is trying to do what he can for his country; but the old statesmen are not favorable to a change. "What has been good enough for our fathers," they say, "is good enough for us."

Good government and intelligent cultivation will work an improvement in Morocco, by which it might attain to a place among the nations. Almost all kinds of grain might be freely grown here, and the country is rich in minerals. It is a country of great natural resources, which only need to be developed.

Slavery is still a recognized institution in Morocco, the victims being brought across the Sahara and the Soudan. Slave-hunts in the Soudan and in other parts of Central Africa are conducted by Mohammedan Arabs, who fiercely contend that they have the sanction of the Koran for these crimes. "I am heartsore," wrote David Livingston, "and sick of human blood. Slaving scenes come back unbidden, and make me start up at night, horrified by their vividness." A great many of the slaves never reach the markets at all, dropping dead along the roads, from wounds made by the slave-driver's whip or from exhaustion. Let us remember Morocco in our prayer, and also the missionaries who are toiling day by day to lead the people to Christ.

About one-half of Morocco is living in rebellion against the present government. The rebels are mostly mountain tribes. Very few of the people living in the country and mountain district ever hear the Gospel. It is dangerous to travel among some of the tribes. The missionaries make long journeys on horseback, camping out at night, and each night they must camp near a village or city, and get protection from the Kaid of the city. He usually sends two men to stay with travelers who visit his town, the traveler paying the watchmen for their work. This you must do in Morocco; if you do not, the government will not be responsible for results. We hope soon to be off, visiting and distributing tracts and Bibles among the people of the interior. Our missionary band is well, and our Heavenly Father has supplied strength for the work. We are reminded each day of his watchful care over us, and he has graciously supplied our every need.

I am sending you, with this letter, a photograph of the present Sultan, also, one of his Cabinet, and some pictures of the city of Fez, where the Sultan resides. The photograph of the Sultan was taken by a missionary, for whom Abdul Aziz has a very high regard. The Sultan is now twenty-three years old, and I am glad to say that he has accepted a present of a Bible from the hands of this same missionary, which Bible he has in his palace now. Let us hope and pray he will read it often, and accept its truths.

Sultan Abdul likes to ride the bicycle.

His dress in the photograph is that worn by his country people. It is called the Gelab. He rides in this dress around the palace grounds. The picture of the Cabinet was taken by a French photographer, who went with the Belgian Minister at a time when the Minister was presenting to the Sultan an engine and two coaches with two miles of railroad track. As the Cabinet Ministers stood awaiting the arrival of the Sultan, the photographer, who was in one of the coaches, raised the curtain a little, and got this picture.

Fez, the Sultan's capital, lies between two hills at the end of a plain. It was built by Mauli Edrees II., in 807 A.D. Its two principal mosques (there are many others), are the Karueen and Mauli Edrees II. Christians and Jews are not allowed to pass the streets while the mosque doors are open; these streets are sanctuaries of refuge for criminals and debtors. No one can touch them as long as they remain there. When any one of these refugees wishes to go to court, or to the Sultan for justice, he takes down an ornamented text from the wall of a mosque (of which there are many), and carries it under his arm. The Karueen is the largest mosque in North Africa. Mauli Edrees is a centre for devotees and pilgrims, while the Karueen is a centre for students, who attend classes there, living in barracks surrounding and belonging to the mosque. A large number of students are fed daily by the government and also by private charity. The studies are chiefly religious. The business men among the Moors are really the educated people; and, as a rule, it is the influential merchants who become successively customs administrators, governors, ambassadors, or ministers of the court.

Fez has two large prisons, in which are foul, underground cells, and the condition of the prisoners is too awful to describe. Often, to escape torture and a lingering death, a prisoner brings his sufferings to an end by a dose of poison. But poisoning is not confined to the prisoners only. For a small sum of money, a man will poison his neighbor, or if a woman sees one whom she loves more than her husband, the latter is easily disposed of. Poisoning in Morocco is not looked on as a sin. They reason thus: "This is a world of sin and sorrow; Paradise is a place of joy and happiness. Hence, to usher one of the faithful out of misery into an abode of bliss cannot be sin."

The Jews of Fez live near to the Sultan's palace. They are not permitted to leave their quarter wearing shoes, or to ride on a horse or mule within the city walls. Child

... A Sermon by ...

of the Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church, Chicago

THE TWAIN MILE

TEXT—Matthew 5: 41: { "Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain" }

A KEEN, shrewd lawyer was one day listening to John Wesley preaching. The founder of Methodism had three different headings for his sermon. First: "Get all you can without hurting your soul, your body, or your neighbors." "That is sensible," thought the merchant, "unless a man is continually reaching out for something, he will never have anything. Industry is the foundation of all success." Second heading: "Save all you can, cutting off any needless expense." "Right again," muttered the listener. "It is not so much what a man earns that makes him wealthy, as what he saves." Third heading: "Give all you can." "There," exclaimed the hard-headed merchant, "the minister has foolishly gone and spoiled everything that he has said. He ought to have had for his third heading, 'Give as little as you can.' You cannot save unless you keep what you have earned." So some of Christ's auditors felt that he was preaching the most foolish of doctrines when he used the illustration of the twain mile. They were ready to obey the Mosaic law of justice. They would assent to an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a hand for a hand. They would travel the first mile willingly, and pay every penny that they legitimately owed. But they were not ready to turn the left cheek to a foe after that enemy had deliberately struck them a stinging blow upon the right cheek. They protested against a communistic Gospel, which allowed a thief to run away with their whole wardrobe, with their cloak as well as their coat. They would not enslave themselves to any merciless taskmaster. For every day's labor, they must have a full day's pay. Yet Christ's statement is strikingly true. It is right in reference to the temporal life, as well as the spiritual. The willingness to travel the twain mile is the forerunner of all true success. The unwillingness to travel the twain mile is the cause of almost certain failure.

The Test Mile

The twain mile is the place of testing. It is where the powers that be choose the men who are to be honored in life's service. There the human race is sifted. There the faithful are separated from the irresponsible; the energetic from the slothful, the true man from the false, the self-sacrificing from the selfish, the one-purpose man from the indolent, lazy, shiftless individual who lives without a definite aim. The twain mile is the threshing floor of human life, where the wheat is separated from the chaff; the rich grain from the useless tares.

Most of the human race are huddled together and jostling each other during the first mile, where they only do what they have to do. But in the second or the twain mile of life's journey, where a man does more than he is asked to do, he always has plenty of elbow-room. As the great statesman once said, "There is plenty of room at the top of the ladder of Success, although thousands of hands may be reaching for the lowest rung."

Every merchant knows of the separating or testing influence of the twain mile. When a position in the store became vacant, whom, in all probability, did you promote to the vacancy? The clerk who has been in the store for ten or fifteen years, the young man who has never been willing to do any more than he was compelled to do? Did you select the employee who was generally ten minutes late in the morning, the clerk who has his hat in his hand ready to run for home as soon as the hour hand points to the numeral six? Did you promote one who seemed to be indifferent to his work and had to be watched day by day to be kept busy, as a mother has to watch a little child? No. The young man who received the promotion was the poor country boy who entered your store with no recommendation except the willingness to travel the twain mile; the willingness to do more than he was told or paid to do. For years the twain mile young man was the first employee at work in the morning. For years he was the last person to leave the store at night. When the work piled up upon his desk, unbidden by the head of his department, he always staid many hours overtime until the work was done. He was the young man who threw himself into his allotted tasks with such intensity that he made his employer's interests his interests.

Who is the leading member to-day of the New York Bar? The lawyer who when he graduated and could not find clients spent most of the time in the neighboring billiard hall? The young man who became an expert in card playing or in judging the races? No. He was the young lawyer who studied night and day and kept on studying. He was the young man who put his whole heart and soul into the smallest cases which came to him. He did not fritter away his energies, waiting for the big cases to command his services. He is the twain mile lawyer. He does more than he is compelled to do.

A noted case was to be decided in New York City. The chief counsel for the defense was suddenly taken sick. Within twenty-four hours the plea had to be made before the jury. Daniel Webster at that time happened to be stopping at one of the hotels. He was sent for to come to the rescue. The next day he came into the court-room and made one of the clearest interpretations of the most abstruse facts of the law ever delivered before a judge. He won his case, and was paid a fee amounting to thousands of dollars. When the friends crowded around to congratulate, declaring that he had performed a legal miracle, Mr. Webster answered, "My effort was no miracle. I did not prepare that address in a few hours. It took me months and months to master these facts of the law. The history of my plea is this. Many years ago, when a young man, I was engaged to defend a poor farmer. His case financially represented only a few dollars. I think a fifty dollar bill was my fee. It was a small case, but the points of the law involved then, were exactly the same as the legal points which I presented to-day. I went to Boston and bought many books. They cost me hundreds of dollars. I spent four exhaustive months in work upon that case. I am receiving to-day the reward of the mental labor which I expended for my country friend." Mr. Webster was

A Twain-Mile Lawyer

He was willing to do more than he was asked or paid to do. The same facts which have been stated in reference to the clerk and the lawyer are true when applied to the successful physician, the minister, or inventor. They can be applied to the true temporal success of all men in every department of life.

Now, God in the same way is testing the spiritual availability and the future usefulness of his servants. He tests them by their willingness to travel the twain mile; to do more than they are asked to do. He tests them by the way they go and hunt up the poor invalids in the back alleys. He tests them by the way they are willing to assist in some mission work. He tests them by the way they are ready to teach in the Sunday School, and by the way they take part in the Christian Endeavor prayer meetings. He tests them by the way the mistresses try to uplift the spiritual welfare of the kitchen, and by the conversations the merchant has with the young clerk in reference to the salvation of the boy's soul.

My friend, you think your spiritual position in life is very humble, but you have a twain mile to travel. That twain mile, whether it starts from the nursery, the factory, the mechanic's bench, the laborer's ditch, or the farmer's plow, heads straight up to the Throne of Grace. God is spiritually judging you to-day by what you are spiritually willing of your own accord to do for him.

The twain mile has for a guide the angel of inspiring Hope. The man who lives without ambition, or without the hope of making something better out of his life is practically dead. He is like the branch of a tree in midwinter. All its latent buds are frozen. Then the sap of life is unable to flow. But when the spring comes, then the snowflakes melt away. Then the air is redolent with incense. Then the tree takes on a new life. Later on, if the tree is an apple tree, its branches are laden with the golden fruits.

The pathway of the twain mile is always warmed by the life-developing sunshine of Hope. The young man says to himself, "I am ready to work years and years, if necessary in an inconspicuous position. I am ready to work hard and do more than I am asked to do, because I know that at last, my employer will reward me with a higher position." The young college student says, "I am ready to bury myself in my books and work hard, because I know that at last, there will come a time when my industry will be recompensed as well as recognized."

Twain-Mile Workers

The young man is led along the twain mile of sacrifice the more willingly, because as he walks hand-in-hand with the sweet angel of inspiring Hope, he reads the lives of the great men of the past. He finds that the position from which some of them started to climb the mountain of fame and usefulness was often more humble than that which he is filling. He sees a poor, ignorant, colored boy standing before the bill-board poster, trying to learn how to spell. Then he sees that ignorant colored boy grow into the great orator, until Frederick Douglass' name becomes known over the civilized world. He sees a young man as a Sunday School teacher gather his own class of rough boys by going into one of the poorest and most depraved sections of Chicago. Then he hears of that young man, D. L. Moody, who was the greatest evangelist of the last century. He sees Dr. Barnardo called to his great work by being led by the hand of a street urchin to where fifteen little boys were spending a winter night in a coal-bin. There the great human saviour of the London street arab saw fifteen hungry urchins, who were on their way, but for his rescue, towards the gallows, the penitentiary, or the poorhouse. When the young man thinks of these great men, he says, "I, too, have a mission in life. I, too, can accomplish some good for my fellowmen, if I am ready to travel the twain mile of self-sacrifice."

Reward Assured

So the sweet-faced angel of Hope leads the disciple of Christ along the self-sacrificing pathway of the twain mile. She puts the Bible into the disciple's hand and says, "Read, Christian, read. That Bible is the promise God has given to you. God declares that if you will do what he bids you do, you shall have your reward for traveling the twain mile for him." Then the Christian, believing the Bible, says to himself, "I will do what Christ wants me to do. I will live as Christ wants me to live. I will speak what Christ wants me to say. I know that Christ will reward me at the end of the twain mile. Did not my Saviour promise: 'Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.' I may not have earthly wealth, but I shall surely have treasures laid up in heaven. I may not have worldly adoration, but I shall have the commendation of my Saviour. I may never be a temporal potentate, but I shall be coronated among the redeemed of heaven. I shall hear Christ say, 'Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

When the disciple of Christ is traveling the twain mile, he is always being led by the angel of inspiring Hope. The twain mile is the place where the Christian traveler upon life's journey learns how to forgive an injustice, as well as to forget. Forgiveness is one of the Gospel fine arts. It is the power which comes into a Christian's life which practically says, "When I have a work to do, and only a short time in which to do it, I cannot afford to be wasting my energies in foolishly attacking those people who are attacking me. I cannot, as a general, be spending most of my time in pursuing a few foraging parties when I ought to be marching on towards the great city of Gospel Success." Besides that, the Christian traveler says to himself, "Perhaps I have not done my full duty toward my enemies. Perhaps I have not been kind and loving enough. Perhaps I have not presented my Jesus in a clear, simple way. If I did, then I might change the foes of Christ into his loving disciples. I will forgive as well as forget. After mine enemy has smitten me on one cheek, I will turn to him the other also. After he has compelled me to go with him one mile, I will go with him twain."

Self Sacrifice

This is not an absurd interpretation to make of the Christian's feelings in reference to his enemies when he is trying to travel the twain mile of forgiveness. Almost without exception, the truly great men who have consecrated their lives to a temporal cause have been able to drop the bitter personalities out of their existence. They were able to forgive as well as forget the personal injustices which had been practiced against them. When the North German States were being welded into the great Confederacy of the German Empire by the master statesman of the last century, Prince Bismarck said to a friend during the darkest days of the struggle, "I must not think of what mine enemies might say or do. To attain this end, I would brave all dangers, exile, indeed, the scaffold itself. What matter if they hang me, provided the rope with which I am hanging binds this new Germany firm to the Prussian throne?"

During the last days of the Southern Confederacy, the Southern Army was fleeing towards Appomattox Court House. On account of the awful bombardment, it had dwindled into a mere handful. Gen. Robert E. Lee, one of the grandest characters in history, summoned a prominent general to his side and asked him what he should do. "Anything, General Lee," answered the subordinate, "except surrender. We do not want your enemies to say that you had to give up your sword. Bid the soldiers scatter and we will join the armies in the South. Do not spoil your grand record. Do not surrender." "No," answered General Lee, "I cannot think of myself. The war is hopeless. If the men disperse, they must live off the country and cause useless suffering. I must be true to what is right. I must not think of what people might say. I shall surrender." If such men could drop the personalities out of their lives, all true Christian soldiers should be ready to travel the twain mile for Christ's cause. We should forget as well as forgive. We should no longer have the enmities which some of us bear our fellowmen.

MISS GOULD'S GIFT TO OUR SAILORS

Dedication of the Naval Branch of the Y.M.C.A.

THIS is the first building for the men of our navy, and it is the gift of women. It stands a noble bond of veneration and affection connecting our sailors with the highest type of America's Christian womanhood," said Dr. Lucien C. Warner, Chairman of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., accepting in behalf of that organization the beautiful new edifice at 167 Sands street, Brooklyn. The presentation had been made by Miss Helen Gould, as Chairman of the Dedication Committee of the Woman's Auxiliary, in a brief address, from which the following is taken:

The Naval Branch is not a charity in the ordinary acceptance of the term, for the sailors who come here will pay for their board as in a hotel or boarding house, but the building will be devoted to them and to their interests, and the sum exacted will be moderate. Mr. Chairman, this building represents the time, thought, labor and money of many different people. In the name of the Women's Auxiliary it is now committed to the care of your committee, and we earnestly hope you will give careful attention to its management, in order that the good intended may really be accomplished. We trust the men of the Navy may always find here a cordial welcome, in a well conducted establishment, where they will meet only good and wholesome influences. I have the honor to present you the keys.

The dedication ceremonies were dignified and impressive. Upon the platform were Secretary of the Navy W. H. Moody, Admiral Dewey, Rear-Admirals Barker and Higginson, Gen. Joseph H. Wheeler, Col. J. J. McCook, Dr. St. Clair McKelway, Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, Rev. Dr. Donald Sage Mackay, Chaplain Jones, International Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. William B. Millar, Mr. John S. Tichenor, official head of the new building and others. Among the distinguished ladies with Miss Gould were Mrs. E. A. McAlpin, President of the Woman's Auxiliary; Mrs. Russell Sage, the Vice-President; Secretary-Treasurer, Miss O'Neill. The stage, the auditorium, in fact the whole building, was gorgeous with flags and gay with flowers. The Marine Band discoursed sweet music, and the jackies, whenever they got a chance, almost "lifted the roof," cheering Miss Gould, Admiral Dewey, and their other friends. The Admiral, given as the world knows to brief and telling speeches, said just this:

It is a great pleasure to me to witness the dedication for American sailors and marines of this beautiful home, the like of which is not to be found elsewhere in the world. It is both meet and proper that the provision for them which you have here established should be superior to all of its kind; for I believe—indeed, I speak knowingly and after much thought—that we have in our navy the best in all the world.

Scripture selections were read by Dr. Hillis, and the dedicatory prayer was offered by Dr. Mackay. Every address delivered emphasized this point: The soldier is a better soldier, the sailor a better sailor when under Christian influence; business men and army and navy officials recognize the fact that no mere secular agency takes the place of sound religious work in making the man before the guns—the defender of his country—strong, steadfast and true. Said Col. McCook: "The best work can not come from humanitarianism alone, noble and desirable as that may be. It must flow from something deeper; the love of God. The greater includes the less; he who loves God must needs love his fellow-man. It is to the prayers of these good women, as well as their gifts and labor we must look for the safe keeping of our sailors." Secretary Moody brought the greetings of President Roosevelt.

In the afternoon, the handsome portrait of Rear-Admiral Philips was unveiled, Mrs. McAlpin making the address. In the evening, hundreds of sailors crowded the auditorium at a meeting in which Miss Gould, Mrs. McAlpin, Rear-Admirals Barker and Higginson, Mr. Tichenor and others addressed them. Rear-Admiral Higginson explained the Committee's plan for forming a Y. M. C. A. branch co-operating with headquarters in Brooklyn on every vessel in our navy and in every port where sailors land.

The building and ground covered, is as readers of this paper recall, Miss Gould's gift to our sailors and her filial tribute to the memory of her parents. Benevolent persons have furnished a number of rooms; so have the crews of several warships, naming the apartments after their vessels. The cost of the institution is $450,000. It is an ideal sailors' home and Christian Clubhouse.

Y.M.C.A. NAVAL BRANCH—FIRST IN THE WORLD

Jesus has been given as an example for all his disciples to copy. What did Christ do when he was scoffed at and spit upon? Why the enemies made so many charges against Christ, that Pilate, in amazement, asked him to say something and refute the charges. "Hearest thou not how many things they witness against thee? And he answered him never a word, inasmuch that the Governor marvelled greatly." Christ came to save a world. Jesus did not have time, nor inclination to spend the last moments of his earthly life fighting his detractors, neither should we.

The twain mile is the place where the enemies of the true Christian are either mellowed, or completely conquered by love. As the willingness to love one's enemies makes a man strong to go forth to the battle of life, so that willingness to love an enemy dulls the battle-axe of almost every foe. Love is the most dangerous enemy Hate has to combat. Love is the duelist which will disarm many a fatal adversary. Love is the shield which can blunt or snap every plunging spear. Love is the dazzling light which can woo a smile from many a scornful lip, and the tear of remorse from many a flashing eye.

My brother, the difficulty with you and myself is, we have been fighting our enemies with the wrong kind of weapon. We have been fighting fire with fire, hate with hate, bitterness with bitterness, slander with slander, death with death. But now Jesus has given to us a new way to conquer our enemies. We must disarm hate with love, we must submerge slander with forgiveness, we must answer a curse with a prayer, we must offer to the clenched fist an open palm, we must extend to every enemy a helping hand. Surely this idea is the interpretation of the words: "Whosoever shall smite thee upon thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." "Whosoever shall compel thee to go with him one mile, go with him twain."

In ancient times, so goes the story, a Roman commander at the head of his legion, went forth to capture a great city. With rattle of chariot wheel, and flashing of spear, and defiant standards, and signaling bugle blast, the invading army approached the city wall. Much to their surprise, they found every gate wide open. The merchants were working in their stores, the women were working in their kitchens, the farmers were in their fields. The Roman commander asked in surprise of the inhabitants who came forth to greet him, "Where are your soldiers? We have come to fight." "We have no soldiers," was the answer of the inhabitants. "We are a people of peace. We welcome you to our homes. We will care for you as long as you wish to stay." "Well," answered the Roman commander, "if there are no soldiers to fight, we shall march on." The Roman army came to battle with sword and with spear. They were conquered by love. So our enemies have been for years attacking the walled and fortified citadels of our hearts. If we would open the barred gates of love to those enemies, and lower the drawbridge of affection, we would capture nearly all of our foes by the power of love. The twain mile may have its thistles and thorns and stony highways, but most of those thorns can be blanketed with the roses of Sharon. Most of those pebbled pathways can be covered over with a soft quilt of grass which once grew at the foot of the tree, out of which was cut the beam of the Cross.

The twain mile is the place where Jesus becomes to every Christian a treasured, loving personality. Well substantiated is the fact that love grows as much upon what we do for others as what others do for us, upon what we are ready to give as upon what we are ready to receive. In order to have true love, we must be ready to lose our lives before we can have those lives come to their true development. We must be ready to die if we want to truly live as we ought to live.

Why is a mother's love the purest of all earthly loves? Because the baby directly does so much for the mother? Oh, no. There never was a bigger tyrant who ever wielded a sceptre than a little baby in the average home. From the time the child is born, until grown, it practically does nothing for the mother. The mother is always doing something for the child. From the advent, someone has to keep tending the child. The mother feeds it, dresses it, cares for it. For the first year, at least, the mother has a tugging silver cord of affection, with one end attached to the crib, and the other end attached to her heart. She practically lives by the side of that child for weeks and months. Then, when the baby is sick, who nurses it? The graduate from the school for trained nurses? Oh, no. The trained nurse may come in and help. The person who, for weeks, never takes off her clothes, the person who is always by the side of the crib, and sees that the medicines are given regularly, the person who is anxiously touching the fevered cheek, is the mother, the sacrificing mother.

Why is love generally purer and deeper and wider in the poor man's home, than in the rich man's palace? Some people may declare that this statement is untrue. But if you have been around as a pastor as much as some ministers, you will find that such a statement is true. The reason that love is generally sweeter and purer in the poor man's home, is not because the poor man naturally has a bigger heart than the rich man. But the poor man has to daily sacrifice for his wife and children. When Christmas comes around, in order to have a Christmas tree, perhaps the father himself has to go without an overcoat. When his sons are to be sent to college, in all probability, the poor man will have to run into debt. He has to work overtime. He has to live in a small house upon a side street. His love feeds upon his sacrifices. So, my brother, if you and I want to love and truly love Christ, we must be willing to do something for Christ. We must give ourselves body, mind and soul to his service. We must be ready to travel for him the twain mile. It is because some of us are not ready to travel this twain mile, that Christ's teachings seem harsh, and perhaps unsympathetic.

Some years ago, in the mountains of North Carolina, a rich lady was riding along in her carriage. Being overtaken by a thunderstorm, she found shelter in a farmer's home. The place was very humble. As in many poor homes, there seemed to be healthy children everywhere. But there was also one crippled child. The rich lady said to the mother, "Can nothing be done for that child?" "No," answered the mother, "nothing can be done. The village doctor said the great surgeons in New York might help him. Of course, we have no money to send him there." The rich lady pitied the child. She took him to New York. While there, the surgeons straightened out the crippled limbs. But though the little child was at that time a cripple, yet on account of what the rich lady was doing for him, he had strength enough to crawl into the rich lady's heart. Then the rich lady went back and said to the mother, "Since I have been caring for your boy, I have learned to love him. Will you let me adopt him? I want to bring him up as my own child and make him my heir." In after years, the boy used to crawl into the rich lady's lap and say, "Mamma, I am glad I was once a poor little cripple. If I had not been a poor little cripple, you would not have pitied and worked for me and learned to love me when you were saving my life." So, when we work for Christ, when we travel for him the twain mile, the Saviour creeps into our hearts as well as we creep into his.

And my friend, I want you to further remember that as you travel along the twain mile for Christ, He is also traveling along the twain mile with you. Upon the one side of you will go, as I said before, the sweet-faced angel of inspiring Hope. But upon the other side, the left side, the side nearest to the heart, you will have for companionship, the One who sticketh closer than a brother. The One who will be by your side, even if your father and your mother should forsake you. If you will only trust Him, He will not let you carry a burden greater than you can bear. He will not let you have a sorrow which He cannot and will not cure. He will not let you shed a tear unless He is ready to wipe it away. He is used to traveling the twain mile. He once traveled that twain mile of His own accord. He left heaven and traveled it to the foot of the Cross to carry our sins and to die for us. Christ gladly did all this for you. Are you ready to travel the twain mile for Christ?

THE GREAT WEST INDIAN DISASTER

Scenes in the Ruined City of St. Pierre and its Environs, as They Appeared Before the Volcanic Outbreak

A LEADING ST. PIERRE HOTEL

PICCANINNIES IN THE HARBOR

LATER details from the scene of the great volcanic disasters in the West Indies, prove that the estimate of the loss of life, published in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, was not exaggerated. In St. Pierre, Martinique, alone, 25,000 perished, and fully 5,000 more in the surrounding villages. In the island of St. Vincent, from 2,000 to 2,500 have been killed by the hot sand and cinders thrown out by La Soufriere. On the latter island the entire Carib population, north of a certain line, appears to have perished, but only a few whites. On both islands the distress and suffering are widespread. There are 50,000 in Martinique who must be fed for weeks and possibly months to come. Our own Government, by its very generous appropriation of $500,000, and its quick and efficient relief work, has made actual starvation impossible. Among the first vessels to bring food to the Martinique sufferers were the U. S. N. tug Potomac and the American cruiser Cincinnati, both of which were in West Indian waters when the disaster occurred.

The British mail steamer Solent, acting for the Barbadoes' government, landed doctors, surgeons, and a full hospital staff of trained nurses with a complete outfit, seven hundred barrels of provisions, besides ice and medicines. The United States naval vessel Dixie took out $70,000 worth of food supplies, besides $20,000 worth of clothing and shelters, and $5,000 in medicines—in all, between 2,000 and 2,500 tons. Her relief stores include blankets, hats, shoes, beef, ham, vegetables, tea, coffee, flour, sugar and canned goods. Our Government relief work is in charge of Col. J. H. Gallagher, who conducted army relief work in China. United States Surgeon-General Sternberg has charge of the medical staff which goes to Martinique specially well equipped. All outside tenders of aid have been declined, as it is believed the arrangements made by our Government, in addition to the large relief movements already set in motion by the government of France, assisted by liberal gifts from Italy, Russia, Germany, England and other nations, will be more than sufficient for all the needs of the population.

In addition to the Dixie, other American naval vessels will be sent with supplies as rapidly as the conditions warrant.

In St. Vincent, the situation is like that in Martinique, but fortunately on a smaller scale. Governor Llewellyn reports that 5,000 destitute persons have come

From some of the few survivors of the St. Pierre calamity, interesting details have been learned: George Marie Sainte, second captain of the ship Gabrielle (which was among those lost), was rescued in an injured condition. He says: "On May 8 at 6 o'clock in the morning the sun was shining brightly. Mont Pelee was smoking and the wind was coming from the east and driving the smoke westwardly. The sky in that direction was completely obscured. At about 6.30 o'clock seven columns of white smoke burst suddenly from what was apparently a new crater, and the mountain appeared to be torn from top to bottom. The whole top disappeared. There was a general panic in the city, and thousands of persons rushed to the wharves.

"At 7.30 a boat containing Governor Mouttet with members of the scientific corps (who had a few days before reported the volcano entirely harmless) was seen moving along about 400 yards from the shore, apparently making an inspection. At 7.50 there was a terrible roar and Mont Pelee disappeared from sight in a huge volume of black smoke. Then something enormous and without shape, with terrible rapidity buried all of St. Pierre. The ships in the roadstead rocked, their masts and spars were broken, and they were simultaneously on fire. Only a few aboard the ships were saved."

Captain Sainte's life was saved as by a miracle. He was thrown into the water with four others from the Gabrielle. All were scalded more or less.

M. Sainte held on to a log, and saw a scene of "magnificent horror." There was an incessant rain of lava, mud and stones on the town and the country round about. The air whistled and cracked as though a heavy fusillade was being fired. At nine o'clock, M. Sainte was able to see that Mont Pelee had been reduced in height at least 300 metres, and that the crater had widened. Some hours afterward he and his companions were discovered by the French cruiser Suchet.

It was a strange destiny that engulfed the Governor to Kingstown and Georgetown. Relief stations have been established, and the contributions of food have been so liberal that no outside aid is now needed. There are three hundred sufferers in the hospitals, many of whom will die. Shelter and clothing are now needed more than food, and those are being supplied as rapidly as possible. The British authorities have been remarkably active in relieving the distress. Schools and government buildings are being used to shelter the refugees temporarily.

and his scientific companions, who had persuaded and even forced the native population to remain in St. Pierre after they had taken the alarm and the exodus had begun. That fatal decision cost 25,000 lives. As far as can be learned, the entire party of scientists perished, as the result of their own blind temerity and incredulity. It is not surprising that the poor natives and the sailors should have believed that "the end of the world had come."

Four thousand persons were rescued from Carbet and Le Precheur, nearby villages, and several hundred from Morne Rouge, much nearer to the volcano. Almost the whole island is now covered with a deep deposit of dirty gray ashes. Mont Pelee's fires have abated, though smoke still rises, but the work of exploration can now go on. Many natives from other villages have been detected robbing the dead, and a large number have been arrested by the French authorities.

The ruins of St. Pierre are strikingly like those of Pompeii. Here and there a wall stands, or the outline of a street is distinguished, but the city is a grave for its thousands. Bodies float amid the waters of the bay and are fought for by ravenous sharks. In many parts of the city, melted gold, silver and copper are found, and much jewelry has been recovered by the exploring parties. In one corner, the charred bodies of twenty-two men, women and children, all huddled together, were found. So many of the dead lay face downward that they seemed to have been suffocated by a great volume of poisonous gas from the volcano, which preceded the rain of fire, rocks, lava, sand and dust.

Cremation is employed in disposing of the dead, but the thousands who lie under the ruined city may never be exhumed. There is a probability that St. Pierre will be forever abandoned, and its dead allowed to rest in their grave of lava and ashes. Only 2,000 bodies have been thus far recovered from the ruins.

An inhabitant of Morne Rouge, near St. Pierre, who was watching the volcano at the moment of the catastrophe, said that there were seven luminous points on the volcano's sides just before it burst. There was no distinct explosion, as when a great cannon is fired, but only awful jarring rumblings which shook the earth. He thinks that the entire outburst that did all the work of havoc did not last more than thirty seconds. Then there was complete darkness for ten minutes, caused by the dense volumes of sulphurous smoke and clouds of dust and shattered rocks. The entire country all about St. Pierre was turned into a chaotic waste. All the trees are either torn up by the roots or snapped off and lie level with the ground. The wave of fire stopped about two hundred metres from the suburb of Carbet. The houses are almost all destroyed in that place. On thedral perished, but their bodies are scarcely visible, being covered with the debris.

Another correspondent writes:

"On May 17 Mont Pelee again burst forth, and, as a result, fear and terror is widespread over the stricken island. Thick, glowing, red clouds, interspersed with flashes of light, are issuing from the volcano. Showers of cinders, lasting twenty minutes at a time, are falling. Many topographical changes are being wrought by the eruption. Subterranean activity is by no means ended, and in the northern part of the island wide crevasses are forming, cutting off the northern from the southern half of the island. A remarkable change in the ocean bed off the northern coast has been noted. In some places the lead sinks fully thirty fathoms deeper in the sea than it did previous to the eruption, before finding bottom. This easily explains why cable communication with the island was cut off. New craters are forming on Mont Pelee in the district traversed by Riviere Blanc."

Liberal contributions and prompt action by the various governments have resulted in greatly reducing the horrors of the situation. Everything points to the conclusion that the food supplies now on the spot and those under way will be ample to relieve the distress. Medical arrangements too have been equally efficient. Indeed, the government of Martinique has cabled to the French officials at the Azores, to inform a detachment of doctors and nurses now on the way to Martinique from France that they will not be needed. Indeed, so generous have been the numerous appropriations both here and abroad, on behalf of the Martinique sufferers that the warning has already been given in certain quarters that such large provision may result in pauperizing the natives. In view of all the facts of the case, THE CHRISTIAN

HERALD has decided that any special appeal to its readers at this time is unnecessary. The contributions we have received will accordingly be returned to the senders, who are entitled to thanks for their generous motives. For the photographs on these two pages we are indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Edwin Ives of New York, who lately traveled extensively in the West Indies and Dr. A. S. the Cluse estate, near St. Pierre, a few buildings are untouched. Those who were in them, however, were all found dead. They had been suffocated, but were not disfigured.

"Every house in St. Pierre (writes a correspondent of the New York Sun), not excepting those that were most solidly built of stone, is absolutely in ruins. The streets are piled twelve feet high in debris and hundreds of bodies can be seen in every direction. It is known that many persons who sought refuge in the ca-

Scientists in Error

ONE of the most pathetic facts about the terrible disaster in Martinique, is that the people wanted to flee before the disaster occurred, but were prevented by the Governor. He is said to have ordered the soldiers and police to compel the affrighted people to return to their homes, which they were abandoning, in dread of the catastrophe which occurred the very next day. The Governor was perfectly sincere in assuring them of their safety. It is evident that he honestly believed in it, otherwise he would not have remained on the island himself.

One of the survivors who escaped on the schooner Gabrielle explains in a dispatch to the New York Herald the ground on which the Governor based his assurance. He says:—

A scientific commission, presided over by the Governor, M. Mouttet, assembled in St. Pierre on May 7, the day before the calamity, for the purpose of studying the phenomena of the volcanic disturbances of Mont Pelee. It was agreed by the members of this commission that the relative positions of the craters and the valleys debouching on the sea were such that the scientists could affirm that the security of St. Pierre was complete, and this announcement was made to allay the fears of the frightened citizens.

Unhappily the scientists were in error. They had not foreseen the possibility of the volcano developing new craters and of new channels being opened for the molten lava. Their error was fatal to the Governor, who was among the killed, and to the lives of about forty thousand other persons.

It was a deplorable and fatal blunder. How poignant must have been the remorse of the scientists, when the eruption occurred, as they thought of the suffering of the people, who, through their positive assurance of safety, had been persuaded or compelled to desist from flight! This is not the first time nor the only subject in which scientists have been in error. It would probably be vain to hope that in future they would be more diffident in their assertions. But at least, other people may learn the lesson of not placing too much reliance on their allegations. Of late years many have been troubled by the conflict between science and the Bible. Scientists have assured us that the end of the world cannot come by conflagration, as the Bible declares, but will come in a glacial age of ice. In this statement and in many others in which they contradict the averments of God's Word, they are as positive as were the scientists of St. Pierre. The poor people on the doomed island might have made their escape if the assurances of the scientists had not been accepted. How grievous it will be if poor souls aroused by the preaching of the Gospel, when about to seek safety in Christ, are dissuaded by the scientific opponents of God's Word, and, lulled in false confidence, are overwhelmed in eternal destruction!

Rebellion in the Kitchen

IT is surprising to what extent the reasonable enjoyment of life depends upon harmony in the kitchen. Poor or badly-prepared victuals and an inefficient cook will do more to undermine the peace and well-being of the average household than a half-dozen other causes combined. But there are times when one's sympathies must be extended to the kitchen. Just now it is undergoing an unusually trying experience, and its discordance has been communicated to the dining-room and to all the rooms in the house. Never, since the first cook-room fire was kindled by our pioneer housewives, has the American kitchen been confronted with such an array of troubles as it is now enduring in consequence of the Meat Trust.

Now, there are trusts legitimate, formed for the furtherance of honorable trade, and there are trusts illegitimate, that have been cunningly devised for purposes of oppression and extortion. In this latter category we include the Meat Trust. It has been organized, not to aid the stockraisers, who are the first source of supply, nor the butchers and meat sellers, who deal with the consumer, but to advantage a small class of big "operators" who control the market to the detriment of meat seller and consumer alike. So obviously is this the case that the United States Attorney-General, and the law officers in several States have already begun proceedings against the trust. From all quarters there has come such a cyclone of popular protest from press and people against this selfish trust, that the public officials have been literally driven to adopt a course that will check the trust's rapacity.

But it is yet too soon to sing the requiem of the Meat Trust, although we can hear some of its enemies already tuning up. Rather let us aid the authorities in their fight, which may be prolonged many months, for the beef "operators" are men of ample means and will persist until they are utterly overwhelmed with the law and the statutes. Let kitchen and dining-room be accordant, as becomes good allies, and the Meat Trust will soon feel the effects of such a federation. It is not necessary that we should all become vegetarians, for there are many persons who feel that they could not subsist on a vegetable diet; but there are, on the other hand, multitudes who might very profitably reduce their meat ration, for a time at least. They might do this with advantage to both health and pocket-book.

Though our sympathies are all with the consumer and against the extortioners, we do not believe there is any cause for serious apprehension with regard to the Meat Trust. We feel that it can be safely left in the hands of the law. It is not improbable, too, that a blessing may come out of this particular experience, in the form of salutary legislation, designed to correct trust abuses generally, and to regulate and control those speculative combinations that affect "the necessities of life." Public opinion and intelligent legislative sentiment, all over the land, are tending in that direction, and the day is not far off when immoral combinations to control the food, the comforts and the conveniences of any large proportion of our population will be things of the past—swept aside by a progressive Christian civilization.

Presbyterian Revision

THE explanations of the Revision Committee of the Presbyterian General Assembly, as well as the character of its members, should allay much of the alarm that has been expressed by conservative members of the church. There is no disposition on the part of the committee to repudiate the sterner features of the creed, nor to undermine the logical foundations of Presbyterian theology. The aim of the committee, as explained by its liberal members, has been to bring into greater prominence the loving and genial characteristics of the Divine character. The perspective of the picture is changed, and no more. Sinai, in its rugged grandeur, is still there, but Calvary, with its Cross of infinite love and compassion, is in the foreground, and the atmospheric effect is no longer lurid with the lightning and the storm-cloud, but glows under the beams of God's mercy and beneficence. The terrors of the wrath to come are not minimized, but the sweet invitations, and assurances of pardon are emphasized. The sinner is not scourged and threatened, so much as he is drawn and attracted by the magnanimity and tender affection of a God of infinite compassion. There is in God's Word abundant authority for both aspects of his character, and the Presbyterian divines are justified in insisting that the harsh and repellent features shall no longer eclipse the gracious and benevolent features, but that as, in the preaching of the apostle Paul, the proclamation of the Gospel shall include the goodness, as well as the severity of God.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

The Christian Physician

—SPIRITUAL CONDITION so mightily affected by the physical state, what a great opportunity this gives to the Christian physician, for he can feel at the same time both the pulse of the body and the pulse of the soul, and he can administer to both at once; and if medicine is needed he can give that; and if spiritual counsel is needed he can give that—an earthly and a divine prescription at the same time—and call on not only the apothecary of earth, but the pharmacy of heaven. Ah, that is the kind of doctor I want at my bedside when I get sick, one that can not only count out the right number of drops, but who can also pray. That is the kind of doctor I have had in my house when sickness or death came. I do not want any of your profligate or atheistic doctors around my loved ones when the balances of life are trembling. A doctor who has gone through the medical college, and in dissecting-room has traversed the wonders of the human mechanism, and found no God in any of the labyrinths, is a fool, and cannot doctor me or mine. But, oh, the Christian doctors! What a comfort they have been in many of our households. And they ought to have a warm place in our prayers, as well as praise on our tongues.

The Humble Shovel

—IT CHEERS ME to think that against this old mountain of sin there are hundreds of thousands and millions of shovels this moment busy, and we are all at work under the one Engineer, who came down from his throne in heaven to oversee and help the removal of that mountain, and who has contracted to have it done. I have seen the contract and He is well paid for it. The compensation promised by the throne of heaven is, "I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." The reason so many of us are idle is that we want a bigger shovel or we would like to manage some great hydraulic engine. No, brother. Stick to your shovel. Dig away in your Sabbath classes. Dig away in your missions. Dig away in your homes. Dig away in your pulpits. Do the work next to you. Do not spend too much time looking at the great size of the mountains or at the way others use their shovels. All that you can accomplish toward the removing of that mountain will be with your own particular shovel. Remember little David, with Saul's helmet on him, dropping clear down over his ears, even unto his shoulders. But when he got in his hand the boy's sling, how well he used it! You who want to help in the removal of the mountain, hold on to your shovel.

Beautiful Scars

—THERE IS A KIND of sickness that is beautiful when it comes from overwork for God, or one's country, or one's own family. I have seen wounds that were glorious. After the battle of Antietam, in the hospital, a soldier in reply to my question, "Where are you hurt?" uncovered his bosom and showed me a gash that looked like a badge of eternal nobility. I have seen an empty sleeve that was more beautiful than the most muscular forearm; I have seen a green shade over the eye, shot out in battle, that was more beautiful than any two eyes that had passed without injury; I have seen an old missionary worn out with the malaria of African jungles, who looked to me more radiant than a rubicund gymnast; I have seen a mother after six weeks' watching over a family of children down with scarlet fever, with a glory around her pale and wan face that surpassed the angelic. It all depends on how you got your sickness and in what battle your wounds.

THE LIFE OF DR. TALMAGE—NOW READY

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and all who are interested in the splendid Christian career of the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, will be gratified at the announcement that the complete and authentic life of Dr. Talmage, concerning which we made preliminary mention last month, is now ready. It is a large and handsomely bound volume of 500 pages, finely illustrated. It has been prepared with loving care by those who were most intimately associated with Dr. Talmage, and who enjoyed the best opportunities of forming a true estimate of his character, and the results of his world-wide ministry.

This life is not a dry, dull, matter-of-fact biography, but is replete with those pleasing and delightful touches that make biography attractive. It tells, with extreme fidelity and picturesque detail, the story of Dr. Talmage's youth; his student career, his first ministerial charge, his successful pulpit triumphs. His frequent tours abroad, preaching and sightseeing, are fully described, and his meetings and conversations with the "great ones of earth," emperors, queens, princes and princesses, premiers and famous men and women in different lands. His journeyings in Egypt, Palestine, India and Australia, &c., are all entertainingly described. So also is the famous "midnight exploration," which at the time of its occurrence, produced a tremendous effect upon our American cities. Specially interesting are the chapters contributed by several prominent American pastors, giving their personal reminiscences of Dr. Talmage. These chapters let in a flood of realistic light upon the life and character of the great preacher. His matchless eloquence, his wit and humor, his utterances on great questions, his philosophy, and his own statement of his creed, are treated in special chapters. An entire chapter is devoted to anecdotes of Talmage, few of them known to the reading public. The book closes with the sad story of his last journey and death, and the tribute the Christian world paid to his memory.

Spain's Boy King

WITH ancient pomp and ceremony the reign of Alfonso XIII., King of Spain, was inaugurated on May 17. Guarded by a double line of military the youthful monarch rode through the streets of his capital to the Cortes, where the oath of office was administered to him in the presence of the Grandaes of Spain, the members of the Parliament, the Diplomatic Corps and a host of his subjects. Thence he went to the Cathedral, where the Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo received him and gave him his benediction. The young king is said to have borne himself with grace and dignity and to have impressed all spectators with his manliness and composure. He is only sixteen years of age, but is tall for his age, though somewhat frail. He has been carefully educated under his mother's superintendence and has become an accomplished linguist and a master of other branches of knowledge. During the past two or three years he has undergone military drill and has engaged in outdoor sports in the hope of strengthening his delicate constitution. His mother has devoted herself from his birth to his development both in mind and body and all the reports of the young man's character indicate that he has profited by her care. He appears to realize that it is a heavy burden that he takes up, in assuming the reins of government. He is grave beyond his years, but shows much of his mother's spirit in the independence and courage with which he enters upon his responsibilities. He occupies the unique position of having been born a king, as his birth took place six months after his father's death. In name, therefore, he was a king when he came into the world, according to the hereditary ideas of monarchical countries. To people accustomed to republican principles, it seems absurd to make a boy the head of the government, but since that is the custom of the country, we may hope, for the sake of its people, that he will prove such a ruler as the poet-king desired to see in his successor.

The Lord give thee wisdom and understanding, and give thee charge concerning Israel, that thou mayest keep the law of the Lord thy God (I. Chron. 22: 12).

A Deflected Boundary

Colorado journals are taking a lively interest in an effort to obtain the rectification of the boundaries of that State and of Wyoming. They say that Engineers of the Topographic Survey have discovered that the Colorado-Wyoming State line for more than a hundred miles in the western part of the two States is about three miles within Colorado territory. It is said that when the boundary was established, the surveyors found it impossible to cross the Medicine Bow Range, and after making a detour and taking up the line further west they made an error of three miles. It is said that the people in the disputed district are anxious to have the line determined, as they are confident they will become citizens of Colorado. Two thriving towns, Bagges and Drisson, and a rich strip of agricultural and grazing land, assessed at nearly a million dollars are involved. There is often a doubt whether certain persons are included in the boundaries of the Kingdom of God, and sometimes they themselves are not sure; but the time is coming when the dividing line will be drawn unerringly, not according to locality but according to character.

The Lord knoweth them that are his (II. Timothy 2: 19).

A Physician's Warning

An eminent physician utters a timely warning to his professional brethren in a medical journal. He calls attention to the alarming increase in the number of victims of the morphine habit, and to other people who retain prescriptions which contain cocaine or some other anodyne which they continue to use after the emergency for which they were originally given has passed. He thinks that many persons, too, have contracted the habit through using the remedies advertised to alleviate pain and so induce an appetite which is worse than the pain itself. Multitudes of men and a still larger number of women have in this way become victims of an insatiable craving which demands to be periodically satisfied with ever increasing doses. The remedy gives them relief from suffering and they have recourse to it whenever they have a headache or any trifling malady, until they become so accustomed to taking it that they cannot do without it. Many of these remedies contain opium, morphine or cocaine and the patient unconsciously contracts in taking them, an appetite which he cannot shake off when he tries. The last state of that man is worse than the first, and physicians act wisely who keep from the knowledge of their patients the drugs which, while giving temporary relief from suffering, enslave and destroy them. The faithful minister, too, is often placed in circumstances when his people desire comfort, which it is his duty not to give.

Who say to the seers, See not; and to the prophets, Prophecy not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things, prophecy deceits. (Isa. 30: 10).

Unhealthy Jewels

A well-known jeweler in New York, speaking recently of the losses which men in his business incur, mentioned the curious fact that precious stones are suscepknown to him, and he will keep them from all that will harm them unto the end.

They shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels (Mal. 3: 17).

The Mystery of a Clock

A workman who was employed to remedy the variations in the great clock over the Grand Central Depot, in New York, gives a curious explanation of a mystery that puzzled him for a long time, and gave him a great deal of work. The clock was continually wrong in its time. Sometimes it was too fast, and sometimes too slow. He took it to pieces, and examined every part carefully, without finding the cause. At first, he thought some part of the mechanism had been magnetized, but a test proved that it was not so. Every part was perfect, and he could not understand why it did not keep accurate time. One day, after he had been again called in to set it right, though only two weeks before he had thoroughly overhauled it and pronounced it in good order, he stood on the other side of the street, looking up at it and pronouncing something like a malediction on its vagaries. As he gazed at it, he saw a pigeon alight on the minute hand, and stand there preening its feathers. The spectacle gave him a clue to the mystery. He waited awhile, and saw the pigeon fly away when the minute hand of the clock was rising to a perpendicular position; but when it had passed the hour mark, and was descending, the pigeon again alighted on it, and kept its position for several minutes. That explained why the clock was sometimes fast and sometimes slow. The weight of the pigeon affected it according to the position of the hand. There was no need after that discovery to take the clock apart. Perhaps an analogous explanation might be given of the vagaries of some Christians who do not always fulfil their duty. They permit some sin or association to hamper them, and neglect to follow the Scriptural advice:

Let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us (Heb. 12: 1).

BRIEF NOTES

The next world's conference of the Young Men's Christian Association is to be held in Christiania, Norway. The Parliament has appropriated 5,000 Kroners [$1,340] for entertainment of delegates.

Mr. Paul Moody has completed his studies at New College, Edinburgh, and has returned to Northfield to assist his brother, Mr. Will Moody, in carrying on their father's work.

A notable revival of religion has resulted from Protestant preaching in France. Pastors report that if they had the assistance of preachers able to preach in French a large harvest of souls might be gathered.

A Christian and Educational Congress, representing the uplifting forces of all the churches now at work for the negroes, will be held in Atlanta, Ga., from the sixth to the eleventh of next August. Booker T. Washington will speak.

The American Tract Society, at its seventy-fifth annual meeting recently held, was able to report additions to its list of publications, not alone in English, but in German, Spanish, Polish, Italian, Dutch, Bohemian, Chinese, Dakota, Greek and Zulu. It receives appeals for its literature from all parts of the world.

The tent "Evangel" has been formally dedicated for work in New York during the summer. It is located at Broadway and Fifty-sixth street. Mr. Ira D. Sankey has given five hundred copies of his hymn-book to the tent for the use of the people. The advisory committee comprises representatives of five denominations.

The Forty-seventh Annual Convention of the New York State Sunday School Association will be held at Saratoga, N. Y., June 10-12. Among the speakers, besides the officers of the Association, will be Dr. A. F. Schaffner, Rev. H. T. McEwen, Miss Mary L. Butler, of Chicago, Dr. Donald Sage Mackay, and Dr. Jesse L. Hurlbut.

In publishing the "Tributes to Dr. Talmage," in a recent issue, a singular mistake was made inadvertently, which involves the necessity of an explanation, in justice to two of the contributors. In forwarding a number of these tributes from Washington—many of them written and signed by the contributors personally—our correspondent wrote upon two of the sheets the names of the Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, Secretary of the Treasury, and Hon. William P. Frye, President of the United States Senate. This the correspondent did to indicate the identity of the contributors. These names were engraved and appeared beneath the portraits of the gentlemen in question as their signatures, which, of course, they were not, nor were they intended to be so regarded by our correspondent. We have written to the two gentlemen interested, explaining the matter and expressing regret at the occurrence.

tible to sickness. He said that every jeweler who keeps a large stock of jewels would be sure to notice with consternation at times, the unaccountable discoloration, fading, or darkening of pearls, rubies, topazes, or opals. Pearls frequently grow sick and develop blotches which destroy their value. A sick ruby loses its light and color, becomes lighter in tint and less brilliant. The topaz, on the other hand, becomes dark and muddy when its health fails. The opal is, however, the most delicate of all the gems, and the one most susceptible to disease. Its prismatic colors are said to be due to minute cracks in the body of the stone, the edges of which reflect the light at different angles, and give the varied tints for which the opal is admired. When the opal becomes sick, it is liable to split in pieces. The cracks which give it beauty open, and the stone separates into two or more fragments. The diseases of all these stones were mysteries until modern times. Science has solved some of them now as it has so many other mysteries. The diseases of the ruby and the topaz are not diseases at all, but are merely the consequence of a prolonged exposure to a strong light. The disruption of the opal, is due to the fact that it contains minute cells of water which turns into steam if the gem is exposed to great heat. If these facts were more widely known, many a jeweler would be able to protect his gems from spoiling. It is consolatory to remember that the souls of God's children, which are his jewels, are thoroughly

CHURCH UNITY IN VARIETY • THE COUNCIL AT JERUSALEM

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JUNE 8
ACTS 15: 22-33

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- "STAND FAST THEREFORE IN THE LIBERTY WHEREWITH CHRIST HAS MADE US FREE." GAL. 5: 1

The Lesson Story

A CHURCH quarrel and what came out of it—this is the tale to be told. There are quarrels between members of a family; quarrels between long-time friends; quarrels between playmates and school friends; quarrels between business associates; but the very worst kind of a quarrel is one between members of the same church. It is the worst, because those who have been brought nigh by the blood of Christ, hold a peculiarly close blood relationship. According to the Divine command, they are to love each other, even as Christ himself has loved them, that is, even to the laying down of life for one another. If angels rejoice at the conversion of sinners, are they not bowed down when there is dissension among the followers of the Lord?

There was a church quarrel in Antioch, a long time ago, and far away; and yet it greatly concerns us. There were two parties: one, the Jews, who had become the followers of Jesus; the other party, Gentiles, people of many nations, but mostly Greek, who had also become Christians. "You must be like us," said the Jews. "You must do the things God told us to do, and you must not do the things he has told us not to do." God had never said to the Greeks: "You must be as Jews;" but God had taught them through Paul and Barnabas to be Christians. "Let us have no quarrel about these things," said some of the best of the Jews, and the best of the Greeks, "but let us ask somebody how we can settle it." And they thought of James, the brother of the Lord Jesus, and Peter and John, and others who had been the apostles of Jesus, and had lived with him, and gone about with him. Let us send men to Jerusalem, where they are, and advise with them what we should do." And so they did. They sent Paul and Barnabas, and several others with them. There were both Jews and Gentiles in the company. They had a journey of more than three hundred miles to take. They carried with them a letter from the church at Antioch to the church at Jerusalem, in which their trouble was all written out. They were kindly, yes, lovingly received by the Christians in Jerusalem, and the letter they had brought was opened and read, and talked about. And then the Christians of Jerusalem said to Paul and Barnabas, and the others with them, "We will write a letter for you to carry back."

It was a wise and kind letter, just such a letter as the Lord Jesus would himself have written. We may be sure that they prayed to Jesus for help to write what was best. They not only wrote the letter, but they said, "We will send back with you two of the very best men in Jerusalem to say kind and wise words." And when they came to Antioch, a large company of Jews and Greeks came together to hear the letter read. It was a company of people willing to do as the letter should direct. And what did the letter say? This: "The Gentiles need not become as the Jews. There shall still be Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians. But there are some things very displeasing to the Jews which the Gentiles must not do: they must not eat meat that has been offered to idols, and they must not drink the blood of any animal. The Jews had been taught that these things were sinful before God, and they could not be friends with people who did either of these things. Then, after the reading of the letter, Judas and Silas talked wisely and kindly to all, and told the Jews that they must give up to the Gentiles, and told the Gentiles they must give up to the Jews, and so the quarrel was settled, and all were happy together."

Illustration and Application

Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them (15: 2-4). Here we see the first sprouts of sectarian strife. The Jewish Christians at Antioch in Syria thought no one could be saved who did not observe Old Testament forms and ceremonies. The Gentile Christians in the same church insisted on liberty to worship more simply. Like Luther and Calvin, Toplady and Wesley, and many more equally good men, they debated these unimportant matters fiercely as if there was only one way to worship God acceptably, which each one insisted was his own way. They finally agreed to submit their conflict to the arbitration of the mother church at Jerusalem, and, accepting its verdict, agreed to disagree, and went on working together in the same church, united in love and loyalty to Christ, but with liberty allowed to differ in modes of worship. Bible classes may well consider which is better, the Antioch plan of keeping together Christians of opposite preferences as to forms of worship, or the modern plan of dividing and subdividing, as in the United States, where there are 154 denominations. (There may be more by the time this is printed, for inventive America invents one or more new sects every year.) Here are other stimulating questions, apropos of this lesson:

Is a return to the organic union of all Christians desirable and practicable? Could not Christians of many sects work together in union churches as they have long done in Y. M. C. A. and Christian Endeavor. If not, could we not, as in Canada, consolidate nearly all Christians in about half a dozen bodies? Pending union, how much of church unity and co-operation and federation is practicable? Pending that how can we banish sectarianism from our own hearts, while holding to denominationalism?

God put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith (v. 9).—Race prejudice and sect pride are still in the Church, and each new generation of converts is in danger of imbibing the idea that though God may save people of other sects because of their "invincible ignorance"—the ground on which the Irish-Catholic servant girl thought the Protestant pastor she served might be saved—yet one's own sect is not only essentially "different," but decidedly better than others. It is most important when children first face the sore puzzle that all Christians are not alike, and especially when new converts do so, particularly in heathen lands, that the explanation of the unimportant differences be made in loyalty to that great motto of the Evangelical Alliance:

In essentials, unity;
In non-essentials, liberty;
In all things, charity.

A child of our acquaintance, in a home where Protestantism was unduly emphasized, on hearing her Sunday School teacher say that Jesus was a Jew, remarked with a deep sigh: "I am so disappointed in Jesus, I thought he was a Presbyterian." And when another child, who had confused more than the two Johns, was asked why John was the "beloved disciple," she replied promptly, "Tos he was a Baptist." Such incidents might be given from homes and classes of every denomination. To a child, church unity may be most sweetly taught from the correct rendering of John 10: 16, "They shall be (not one fold) one flock, with one Shepherd." Or in these June days, they may be shown the unity of the Church pictured in the blossoming tree with many branches.

Why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples (ver. 10). It is Peter, once Jewish yoked himself, who now defends the Gentiles' liberty to refuse the yoke of burdensome ceremonies. Later we shall consider Christian liberty to yield in minor matters in due charity for the weaker brother. But important matters are not to be thus yielded, and the liberty to worship God without any outward forms is too great a right to be sacrificed even for the sake of peace.

This was the point Luther and Knox and Wesley refused to yield, even at the peril of their lives. Every Christian needs to cultivate the grace of resistance when right is at stake, as well as the grace of yielding when it is only rights that we are to give up for the good of others. In the matter of eating meats offered to idols and drinking the blood, no principle was at stake. There was no harm per se in eating meat offered to an idol, because the idol is nothing but a fiction, but as eating such meat scandalized the Jews, who always avoided it, the Gentiles were advised to make this a case of charity rather than liberty. We are not alone to give up really harmful things, but also unnecessary things that offend the conscience and harm the religious life of others. One who is not willing to give up some needless indulgence, that harms his influence and promotes strife in the Church, surely lacks the spirit of Christ, which is the spirit of self-sacrifice even unto death for the good of others. "If by eating of meat," says Paul of idol meat, "I make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world stands." Abstinence for the sake of others, surely every one is bound to that who believes that if others follow his example, it will do more harm than good. But whenever a question of right and wrong is involved, we are not to give up for the sake of seeming kindness to anybody.

It seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things (v. 28). What are the "necessary things" one must do to be saved? There are so many things in our modern creeds, so much machinery about our churches, that we need to go back again and again to the New Testament to learn what is absolutely essential to conversion and a Christian life. The Bible's simplest conversion, its shortest Christian experience, is that of the penitent thief who, dying, prayed, "Lord, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom," and was at once assured by Christ himself of immediate entrance into Paradise. That does not prove we ought not to be baptized, if we can be—he could not—nor does it encourage death-bed repentance, for he probably had known little, if anything, of salvation before, but it does show that in some cases the whole condition of conversion may be a prayer of penitence. Except Paul, all the apostles began a Christian life by a quiet obedience to the words of Jesus, "Follow me." When men said to Paul, who had come to Christ in a great struggle, "What shall I do to be saved?" he answered, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." This saving faith is not belief alone, or trust alone, but both of these and more. Faith, as we may have said before, is a bridge between sin and God, consisting of four arches: First, the arch of belief, built by the intellect; second, the arch of submission, built by the will; third, the arch of trust, built by the heart; fourth, the arch of faithfulness, built by the life. And this bridge is not made of many ornate bricks, slowly prepared, but of a few great stones, the "necessary things" of salvation, which are —first: A belief that God is. Who can doubt that, looking upon the June glories? Second, a belief in Christ as the world's Saviour. Who can doubt that with nineteen Christian centuries of progress before him? Third, a belief in the Bible as the divine guide-book of life, presented to us as such by Christ himself.

A man of little education, but much faith in God presented himself to a church committee as an applicant for membership. The dignified officers said, "What is your experience, and what are your grounds of hope?" He replied:

I'm a poor sinner and nothing at all.

But Jesus Christ is my all in all.

"But tell us more," the church officers said. "What about yourself?" He replied:

I'm a poor sinner and nothing at all.

"How then can you hope to be saved?"

Jesus Christ is my all in all.

A children's song tells how to be saved in plainest words:

How can a little child be saved,
His sins be all forgiven?
How can he at his dying day
Stand at the gate of heaven?

He must repent with all his heart
And seek to serve his God;
In simple faith he must rely
On Christ's atoning blood.

Let us go again (v. 36). Having spoken of coming to Christ, it is well to turn again to that other word "Go." Notwithstanding the perils he had barely escaped on his first missionary tour, Paul started eagerly on the second. A good illustration of such persistency in doing good, and of the lack of it as well, is found in the old trick that made many a village gaze in wonder a generation ago—the breaking of a great stone by a blow of the naked fist. A committee appointed by the audience at such exhibitions always found the stone whole, with no sign of a crack to help the performer, but one or two blows of his fist would always break it in two. At last the secret got out. By a certain number of blows with a stone cutter's hammer the cohesiveness of a stone is so completely destroyed that the next blow, however light, will break it in twain. The performer had privately put upon the stone with such a hammer all the blows but the last.

The story reminds us sadly of many an enterprise in which blow after blow has been struck, prayer after prayer has been offered, appeal after appeal has been made, with no apparent result, and the worker has given up, disheartened, just when one more blow would have brought the break for which all the blows had been given. Paul kept striking at the flinty hearts of bigoted Jews and idol worshippers until they gave way, and Christianity won the Roman world. And by the same persistency in prayer and work we shall win the world of to-day.

Here it is fitting to quote the words of Dr. Maltbie Babcock at the World's Missionary Conference: "Where would Paul be to-day if he were here with us. He would be in the thin red line in the foreign field, at the forefront of the battle, where it meets the great black, broad line. I was ever a fighter—Paul did not say it that way—but in effect he said: 'It is my ambition to fight where no one else has ever drawn a sword; let me be the first runner to go ahead with the news of life. Let me build where no one else has built.'" So the Gospel has won its way.

WRITTEN EXPRESSLY FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" BY PROF. GEORGE L. ROBINSON, PH.D., OF MCCORMICK UNIVERSITY, CHICAGO

II.—From Suez to Mt. Sinai

WE left the hotel d'Orient in Suez at half-past one o'clock Tuesday afternoon, March 20, 1900. Our necessary baggage was placed in a cart drawn by a donkey, and all together on foot we followed the leadership of our dragoman down to the landing. There we took a boat and were rowed across the narrow gulf (perhaps two miles broad at this point), to a place called Shatt-el-Bahr on the Asiatic side. Our riding camels were in readiness for us. The baggage caravan had gone on ahead in order to have the tents pitched and everything ready for us when we should reach Ayun Musa, or the Springs of Moses, where we expected to camp the first night. We mounted at three o'clock and at half-past five were at our destination. We had just enough of camel riding that afternoon to excite our interest in the desert and help us forget our previous dread of launching forth.

Tea was served upon arrival, and after refreshing ourselves, we started out to examine the oasis in detail. We found fourteen wells of varying depths, with one exception, enclosed in gardens surrounded with luxuriant palm trees, and containing water, which in every case was not only brackish but bitter. These springs are usually identified with Marah of Scripture (cf. Exod. 15: 23).

One's first night in camp upon the desert is sure to be long remembered. Everything is new. Tents, beds, strange noises such as Arabs talking late into the night, dogs barking at regular intervals, roosters crowing early in the morning, camels growling when being loaded, all these are new experiences and make a lasting impression upon the Occidental mind. We took numerous photographs the next morning while the servants were breaking camp, and walked some distance ahead of our camels before mounting.

The stretch of alternating wady and plain between Marah and Elim which required two days' camel riding (a camel travels, it may be said, at the "giddy" rate of two and one half miles per hour), is unusually monotonous. On the left of our caravan is the escarpment of Jebel-et-Tih; on the right the sea coast, the gulf, and beyond, the sandy-looking mountains of Egypt.

Elim is usually identified with Wady Gharundel, which is a broad valley filled with stunted palms, tamarisks, and other shrubs, and, comparatively speaking, well watered. Tiny pools we found here and there. Our Arab servants found no difficulty, by digging down a bit, in finding abundance of water for themselves and their camels. They dug several such pools. Others are said to exist further up the valley. Here Israel found twelve wells of water and seventy palm trees (Exod. 15: 27). We counted over fifty palms, but they were all dwarfed in size.

Shortly after leaving Elim we met the post-messenger, who was making his bi-monthly trip on a swift dromedary from the monastery at Mt. Sinai to Suez. We asked him to tarry a moment until we could add postscripts to our letters, already prepared, and send them back with him to Suez. He assented, accepting of a small bakshish for his trouble. From this point on, the country became more undulating. Indeed, another day brought us into a region of hills and valleys. Occasionally we caught glimpses of the distant peaks of Jebel Serbal and el-Benat. Winding to the right we entered the picturesque valley of Wady Tayyebah, where we found the most wonderfully variegated and tinted stratified rocks we had ever seen. They had all the appearance of human masonry. Their coloring was superb. We stopped to make a memorandum of the different strata. Here are some of the colors which we noted, beginning from the top, down: Burnt-amber, light-yellow, gray-black, purple, red, terra-cotta, red, lavender, light-yellow, buff. And, indeed, these are the predominating colors of the rocks of the Sinai peninsula generally. One regrets his inability to photograph the colors of such rocks, for nature is particularly lavish in these parts. Perhaps some one in the near future will apply the art of colored photography and so be able were reminded of Jethro and Moses (cf. Exod. 18: 2, 7). We left the wilderness of sin before we reached its extreme southeastern limit, in order that we might visit the turquoise mines of Wady Maghara, identified by some with Dophkah (cf. Num. 33: 12). This route took us over the pass called Nakh Budra. The mountains grew grander and more majestic as we proceeded. We luncheoned that day "in the shadow of a great rock." We spent our first Sabbath close by the mines, and one of us preached a sermon. There was water in the vicinity. The existence of mines here and at Serabit-el-Khadim, not far to the northeast, has an important bearing upon the question of Moses' flight to Midian, and the probable route of the Exodus. For these mines bear monumental witness to the effect that they were worked by the Egyptians during the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties, the period of Moses. Hence the question arises, Is it likely that Moses would lead the Israelites by this route? Probably not, though he might safely have led them along the more frequently traveled route, beyond the mountains by the sea, direct from the wilderness of sin into Wady Feiran. The ruins of an old fort close by the mines, which seems to indicate that the miners were protected by Pharaoh's soldiers, enhances the probability of this conclusion.

One day's journey from Wady Maghara brought us to the largest and most important oasis of the peninsula, that of Wady Feiran, the scriptural Rephidim (cf. Exod. 17: 1). On the way we rode through the famous valley of inscriptions called Wady Mukhatteb, where are to be found hundreds of Nabatean, Greek, and Arabic inscriptions, but very carelessly engraved and unfortunately of little importance archaeologically. Entering Wady Feiran, we soon discovered, as we followed up its sinuous course, that our horizon was becoming contracted, the mountains growing higher and higher. We were nearing the base of Jebel Serbal. Becoming a little impatient of the narrow and ever winding valley, I turned to Risq, one of our camel boys, and asked him if Jebel Serbal had not receded. He replied, La masboot ("No, it is firm.") At length we came to a large rock, which has been pointed out as the one smitten by Moses when Israel was in need of water (cf. Exod. 17: 6); turning a corner, we arrived at the lower end of the oasis. Here we found numerous gardens and huts, and trees—ethel, tarfa, nebk, and palms (the dates from which are among the best in the world), caves also in the rocky steep which bound the Wady, numerous tombs, the ruins of a fortress, and most eloquent of all, a copious stream of water the size of an ordinary meadow brook, the first seen since leaving Suez.

Our tents were pitched at the junction of Wadies, Feiran and Aleyat, on the very battlefield where Joshua fought and discomfited the Amalekites (cf. Exod. 17: 8-16). The next day was spent in climbing Jebel Serbal, which the Latins claim is the Mount of the Law. Six hours were required for the ascent and four to return. The approach is difficult over huge boulders, and there to bring back the exquisite coloring of these mountains and rocks which made such an impression upon the shepherd-lawgiver of early Israel. All Sinai is vocal with God.

Like the Israelites, we, too, "encamped by the sea" (cf. Num. 33: 10). Before us stretched for several miles the narrow coast-desert of sin, but large enough for a camping-ground for all Israel. At certain points the mountains came down abruptly very close to the water's edge, but never so near as to obstruct Israel's passage. As we neared the southeastern end of the plain two men and a camel were seen on the left coming in our direction. Sheikh Salim, the chief of our Arab servants, immediately struck out to go over and greet them. One of the two saw him approaching and went forth to meet him. When they met they saluted each other in Oriental style, kissing each other twice, and then sitting down, asked of each other's peace. We

CHILDREN'S DAY

By Margaret E. Sangster

IT is a beautiful custom that sets aside one idyllic day in the loveliest month of the year, to be the children's own special Sabbath. Then we adorn our churches with the fairest flowers, we bring birds to swell the melody with their golden throats, and we invite the children, in the gladness and sweetness of their morning prime, to sit in the pews and take part in the worship. How happy they look, these darlings of hearth and home, and how cheerily their hymns of praise ring out. There is a sermon meant for them, and the minister makes it short, and crams it with stories, and takes for his text some theme that even the youngest can understand. And we who are older listen and reverently remember that once our Lord set a child in the midst of grave disciples, and told them that if they would inherit the kingdom of heaven, they must become as that little one.

Always the children have a right to the sanctuary privileges, and if parents are wise they will not lose the early years, when the church-going habit is formed. Though the little ones grow weary, there comes a time when they are glad to recall Lord's Day morning with father and mother in the solemn assembly. They are insensibly educated when they sit silent and patient while the pastor preaches. Indeed, their good behavior is their form of worshipping God, and he accepts it as their offering. Often they understand more than grown people think, and there are few children who do not enjoy the hymns and the organ, and the quiet, and the pleasure of being in the great congregation. Children's day belongs to themselves. The Sunday School gathers its clans then, and the dear teachers sit with their classes. Especially charming is the infant school. The wee tots as flower-like as the roses and violets, the daisies and pansies which make the church a bower of fragrance and bloom.

Blessings on the children. They are our chief hope, our chief delight, our chief joy. Only a few more years and they will be men and women. Let them be so trained that they will stand up for Jesus in an evil world, that they will fight the devil and his wiles, and come off victorious in the strife, through Christ their Captain.

AN ORIENTAL CANOE

We must go to the far East to find such women as the lady, who sits, adorned with jewels and in rich robes, her daughter near her, and her servants paddling her light canoe over flashing seas. Bright as the sunlight lies upon the waves, there is sadness in her heart, and a pensive look in her eyes, for unless the Sun of Righteousness has beamed upon a land, there is always gloom in the minds of its people.

—BETROTHED. I wish young women were less anxious about the attentions of men. An engaged man who plays fast and loose with one he professes to love, and seems to be tired of her, should be set free, and the girl, looking at the affair in its proper light, should not grieve for one who is unworthy of her.

Too Much to Do

MY wife has too much to do. "Why don't you help her then?" "She is not a woman who can be helped," said the man wearily. "She is so very particular, and worries so over every trifling bit of dust and dirt. If she could take the range clear out every Saturday, she would be better satisfied than she is."

The husband put his finger on the weak spot in some women's housekeeping. They are over-fastidious, and do more than they need; they are ever boastful of their extra nicety, and do not reflect that they are recklessly using up their strength and vitality. When a woman's excellent housekeeping kills her at forty-five, or, leaving her alive, transforms her into a nervous wreck, making her a burden to herself and a terror because of ill-temper to her family, that sort of housekeeping is a fearful blunder.

Line Upon Line

When the mind is receptive, as in early childhood, it is very easy to store it with passages of Scripture and hymns. I know a little girl under seven who can repeat the Creed, the Ten Commandments, the Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Psalms, and many hymns and sweet poems. Every day her mother teaches her viva voce for perhaps ten minutes at a time, several times a day, and, almost without conscious effort, she is being mentally enriched, and is laying up treasures for days to come. That which is earliest learned is most indelibly impressed on the tablets of the brain, and we, who neglect to cultivate our children's memories in the line of divine truth, are really defrauding them of wealth to which they have a right.

Little Attentions

They were two old people. They had lived together fifty years. She was about to leave the room, and her husband rose from his chair, crossed to the door, and opened it for her, saying good-night with a courtly manner, as if speaking to a queen. The next morning as he was going out, she pinned a flower in his button-hole, patted his coat lovingly, and kissed him affectionately. Of such trifles the web of home comfort and heart-joy is woven.

EAGER FOR OUTINGS

GREAT preparations are being made in the tenements for outings at Mont-Lawn. First of all, many honest, hard-working mothers of expectant guests are making efforts to get at least one suit of neat apparel in shape for each small member of the family who may go on this wonderful journey. Little waifs themselves make such endeavors as they can. We quote from a missionary's letter:

I am grateful for permission to bring fifty children. Do you know some children have been getting their poor little bundles ready all winter? A number have their package of one set of garments all tied up and ready, in hopes of a chance to go? They could not duplicate the suit should they wear it out; it is held sacred for that grand occasion, as great an event for them as a European trip is for a millionaire. Sometimes, they cannot save up one suit. Often, going my rounds, I have found a little one naked in bed while his mother was laundering the only clothes he had in the world.

Another letter says:

I know one mother who cut up her only wrapper to make dresses for her two little girls. Oh, the patience and faithfulness of these poor mothers. You have no idea what efforts they make to have their children look decent. Neighbors, too, will lend back and forth, helping to get members of each little company tidy as may be. If the top garment is whole, ambition must often be content; patches, rags and nothing at all are beneath many a promising exterior. Sometimes funny things happen. I could not but laugh the other day when Johnnie D., seeing me coming down into the wretched cellar where he lives, ran and dragged his overalls and all his belongings wet from the fine, saying: "I'll be ready right away, Mrs. St. James."

Missionaries and Sunday School teachers take great pains to have the companies they bring in neat attire. "We've been washing and scrubbing and dressing children down in the basement of our church all morning," said a young Christian Endeavorer last summer. He had an exceedingly creditable corps of applicants. "I had to go out and buy a lot of clothes. That little boy over there came in one garment—a girl's slip—it was all his mother had."

Day nurseries almost always bring presentable little ones. Their charges are usually the children of working mothers, who, when going out to their daily toil, must leave their small folk where they can be cared for. Sometimes these waifs are orphans, and the little brother or sister, who goes to school or works out to help support the family, carries baby back and forth. Some of Mont-Lawn's neediest, sweetest little guests last summer were drawn from the Catherine Mission, with whose good work among the poor of the East Side readers of this journal are very familiar. One of our missionary friends writes: "The children are begging so to go to Mont-Lawn. I wish your generous readers would make it possible for you to send a hundred where you send fifty now."

Rev. Isaac C. Sturges, Pastor of St. Cornelius, says:

Mont-Lawn is being made ready for the coming of the little guests. New sheets are being bought and hemmed and slips made. Bed linen is no small item, when over two hundred cots are to be fitted out. The old linen has done faithful service, and now that it has quite outworn its original purpose is being torn up and used to polish windows and floors; or else it is stored away for the comfort of stumped toes and other juvenile hurts. Flower-beds are being set out that our waifs may have the pleasure of watching pretty plants growing. Many little ones who come to Mont-Lawn have never before seen a flower in blossom.

The Home never looked lovelier. Our waifs will have a happy time playing on the grassy lawn—a luxury indeed to little ones who come from sweltering courts and blistering pavements, where never a blade of grass creeps up. The Home garden is in fine condition and there will be abundance of nice fresh vegetables for our hungry hosts from the tenements, many of whom never know what it is at home to sit down to a tidy table or a square meal. Wee Rocco in our picture is a type of many a waif whose constant headaches come from inanition, as the doctors call it—lack of proper food, in plain English.

Friends all over the Union are helping us prepare the way for happiness and health for our little waifs. Mrs. G. T. S., Charleston, Tenn., sends $3, "in memory of a dear one gone;" Mrs. L. B. B., Demopolis, Ala., $3, "in the name of and for the sake of a dear little girl who always felt much interest in this work and who has now gone to be with Jesus;" Friend, Port Huron, Mich., $3, "in memory of a sleeping loved one;" a Friend, Baltimore, Md., $21, "use according to your own judgment for the poor children" (this will sustain a cot for the season); a Friend in Oklahoma $50 (this more than gives sixteen waifs an outing); a Friend, Glanworth, Can., $1, "the Lord's tenth of a small sum I call my own. God will surely bless this work;" H. C. O., Long Hill, N. J., $6; "from Ladies' Aid Society, Presbyterian Church, Meyersville, N. J.," A. J. P., $2.70. "What was left over from last season's of the Cross Roads Sabbath School. They decided to send the money that remained to help gladden the hearts of the poor children of New York. I pray that this little offering may truly cheer the heart of some little one;" M. G. H., Springfield, Ill., $15, "to make five waifs happy;" A. F. B., Fallsington, Pa., $3. "I am delighted to see how the grand work at Mont-

Lawn goes on. No other charity lies quite so near my heart as this for the little children of the poor."

It costs only $3 to give a waif a ten days' outing at beautiful Mont-Lawn; $6 sends two; $9 three; $12 four; $21 supports a cot for the summer. Will you help? Send contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

"DO WE LOOK NICE ENOUGH TO GO TO MONT-LAWN?"

For several years we have been sending each year from this parish a number of children to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home. The little ones have been much benefited by their outings, many regaining lost health and strength there. Their sojourn at Mont-Lawn has afforded them a great deal of happiness and much relief from suffering. The Home is a blessing to the poor children of New York tenements.

CHRIST'S PROPHECIES

In the Order of Events
Deduced from Our Lord's Eschatological Discourses...

BY REV. ROBERT CAMERON, D.D.*

EACH evangelist who reported our Lord's discourse wrote independently of the others, and therefore selected only those portions of the great discourse which bore upon the end he had in view. Many believe, and, justly, that, whether the evangelist understood or not, the Holy Spirit, who inspired him to write, did understand the end in view, and so guided the writer that he made the selections suitable to his own purpose. The Holy Spirit neither suggested, dictated, inspired or guided the synop- tist in anything, apart from the writer's individuality. The variations, not less than the resemblances, are proofs of the Spirit's care. Therefore, it is im- portant to notice the different features recorded by the evangelists. Both Matthew and Luke say the Olivet dis- course was delivered to the disciples, while Mark limits the names of these to Peter, James, John and Andrew, who represented the rest, and who questioned him privately. Mark and Luke record the question in the same words, viz.: "When therefore shall these things be? And what shall be the sign when these things are about to come to pass?" But Matthew puts the emphasis differently: "When shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end (consummation) of the age?" The emphasis is on the destruction of Jerusalem in Mark and Luke, but it is on "the coming and end" in Matthew.

The outline of the general charac- teristics of the whole period, from the crucifixion down to the period when the Gospel shall be preached amongst all nations as a witness, and when "He that endureth to the end shall be saved," is common to Matthew, Mark and Luke, and there is a substantial agreement in their statements. But Luke alone records the prediction concerning the desolation of Jerusalem immediately after it is "compassed with armies." This siege of Jerusa- lem should be carefully distinguished from "the abomination of desolation." He also records our Lord's declaration that "they"—the Jews—"shall fall by the edge of the sword and shall be led away captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gen- tiles be fulfilled." This period of the desolation of the Holy City, of the dispersion of Israel, and of the supre- macy of the Gentile nations, has al- ready continued from A. D. 70 down to 1901, and we have no means of knowing how much longer it may be extended. We only know that it is in the order of God's providence, and that it is called "Gentile times," as contrasted with Jewish times and sea- sons, that went before these times, and will follow after them.

At this point, where Luke completes his record of what was to happen to Jerusalem and the Jews in the days of their humiliation, he passes on to speak of the signs in heaven and on earth. But, before this "sign time," both Matthew and Mark insert the mysterious intimation of "the abomi- nation of desolation," the time of tribulation unequaled from the begin- ning to the end of the world, the short- ening of those days for the elect's sake, and the rise of false Christs once more. Now, from this point on, all three evangelists agree in their order, until we reach the four great parables that are peculiar to Matthew. Imme- diately after the tribulation of those days, they all say "the sun shall be darkened and the moon shall not give her light," etc. It follows, therefore, that the tribulation spoken of precedes the period generally described as the "sign time," or period of great phe- nomenal manifestation in the heavens and on the earth. Following that period is "the sign" inquired after by the disciples—"the sign of the Son of Man in heaven," the mourning of all the tribes of the land, the sight of the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, and, synchronously, the sending forth of angels with the great sound of a trumpet to gather Christ's elect from the one end of heaven to the other. Accordingly we find that Matt. 24: 15 fits into Luke 21, immediately after verse 24, and Matt. 24: 29 and onward corresponds to Luke from the twenty- fifth verse to the end.

How the Weak Become Strong*

DIVINE POWER MANIFESTING ITSELF THROUGH INSTRUMENTS APPARENTLY INADEQUATE

ONE of the most significant laws of God's government, as described in the Bible, is the necessity of human participation in super- human work. The part that man takes seems so infinitesimal that one wonders that God does not dispense with it alto- gether. Yet, even miracles sometimes ap- peared to need the combination of human agency to make them effective. The ser- pent-bitten Israelites must look at the brazen serpent in order to be cured. There was nothing in the brass image, nor in the look, that had curative power, but without the gaze at the brazen sym- bol, there was no cure. There was noth- ing in the water of the Jordan that could cure the leprosy, but Naaman must dip seven times in it before he could be healed. In the new dispensation, the same law prevailed. The five loaves and the two fishes were so utterly inadequate to satisfy the hunger of five thousand persons, that it is strange Christ used them. As a miracle was necessary, why not work it without any means at all? How was it, too, that at Nazareth, the Lord, who was infinite in power, could not do any mighty work because of the unbelief of the people? Howsoever trivial and apparently worthless the human ele- ment may appear, God makes it essential to his operations.

It is a regrettable result of this law that people sometimes ascribe the power to the human element which is a mere con- dition of its exercise. "Pray as you have never prayed before," says some person who is begging the prayers of God's peo- ple, as if it was the prayer that was the source of power. Some preacher is said to be so eloquent that he converts hun- dreds of hearers. There is no warning so generally forgotten as that which assures us it is "not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." Con- viction of this fact is forced upon us by studying the character of the most suc- cessful preachers and of the instruments that God uses. The people said of Paul that his speech was contemptible. Spur- geon used to say that he would not cross the road to hear such preaching as his own. Multitudes of the preachers in various periods, have been men whom the theologians and the scholars despised, and though great numbers were brought to Christ under their preaching, there was nothing in them or their sermons to ac- count for it. It seems as if God were ap- pealing to us, all the time, to recognize in him the source of power, by using instru- ments wholly inadequate to the work to be done. So clearly did the apostle Paul realize the fact, that he gloried in his in- firmities because he was anxious that the real source of power should be perceived and could not be ascribed to him. God leaves it to men to declare [the Gospel; he insists that it shall be preached by his servants, but their work is only the chan- nel through which the divine influence works.

This fact, though humiliating to human vanity, is very encouraging. The weakest servant of Christ may be used by him for his purpose. Mr. Moody used to com- pare human agency to a locomotive. It might be perfect in construction, every part might be excellent; standing on the tracks its strength might be seen and ad- mired, but alone it was simply a dead weight, incapable of moving itself, much less of drawing a train. What is needed? Only that a fire be lighted under its boiler to produce the steam, which would enable it to do the work. The most complete electrical instruments and the best wires may be in use, but they can do nothing of themselves until the electric current is ap- plied. It is supernatural power that is effective in spiritual work, the instrument which applies it may be weak or strong.

It is only necessary that it be adapted to the purpose. When it takes its proper place as a channel of divine power, when it is not obstructed by pride, or vanity, or sin, or self-reliance it can be used of God. Then it becomes mighty because infinite omnipotent power is behind it, making it effective. This accounts for the fact that we have seen in every age of the church the weak things of the world confound- ing the things which are mighty, and the things which are not bringing to naught the things that are.

The best comfort in our sorrow
Is in serving others found
It will ease our own sad heartache
To bind up another's wound.

We gain strength by strength outgiving,
When we can ourselves forget,
Our own burden will be lighter
With the solace pure and sweet.

A SEASON OF SOUL-WINNING

A TWO weeks' series of evangelistic meetings has just been brought to a very successful close in the West Presbyterian Church of Binghamton, N. Y. This is the church that recently called Rev.

Edwin Forrest Hallenbeck, D.D., to be its pastor. The evangelistic campaign was under the direction of Rev. Dr. Hallenbeck, who was assisted by Prof. W. S. Weeden, as Musical Director.

During a brief illness of Prof. Weeden, his son, Mr. W. C. Weeden, filled this position, and sang the Gospel to many hearts, his fine tenor voice finding full play, particularly in "The Ninety and Nine" and "The Clanging Bells of Time."

Rev. Dr. Hallenbeck's introduction to his larger field of labor through this series of meetings, has been most happy and promising. He is an evangelist of a high order, and an all too rare type. His early training was as an assistant to Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, and he has imbibed not a few of that successful minister-evangelist's ways, supplementing these with others of his own quite as telling. He has a forceful, direct style of delivery. His ministrations have received a rich spiritual blessing.

In one of the recent addresses of Pastor Hallenbeck, these pointed utterances occurred:

The very mention of the marvels of prayer ought to stir our hearts and send us to our knees.

You can't "make terms" with God, my friend. An unconditional surrender of the will is what He demands.

The reason some are outside the kingdom to-night isn't because they can't believe, but because they won't believe.

Righteousness always provokes unrighteousness.

The Clock of Destiny may be about ready to strike for some of us. To doubt, to falter, to hesitate means to be lost.

Dr. Hallenbeck is now serving as the President of the New York State Christian Endeavor Union, and is well known as a Convention speaker.

With the Binghamton campaign, Prof. Weeden comes down to the close of an active winter of evangelistic singing. He has labored in Marshalltown, Iowa; Springfield, O.; Greensburg, Pa.; Pine Plains, N. Y.; Buffalo, N. Y.; and Dayton, Ohio; for the most part assisting pastors in their own churches. This summer he will be engaged in tent work throughout the season.

OUR COMPLETE COURSE IN SHORTHAND

ISAAC PITMAN'S 20th CENTURY REVISION

By Special Arrangement with Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, N. Y.

LESSON XI.

Exercise 31

1. Ten, John, bun, ozone, Dane, then, plain, drain. 2. Doff, Jeff, pave, chough, Duff, hoof, brave, proof. 3. Wean, weave, wine, woof, run, roof, turn, turf. 4. Fen, fenny, Avon, venue, mine, Minnie, nun, ninny. 5. Banish, plenty, organic, mechanic, paving, cuff, coffee. 6. David, gun, agony, martial, travel, chiefly, aniline.

Circles and Loops added to Final Hooks

98. A circle or loop is added to the hook n attached to a straight consonant by writing the circle or loop on the same side as the hook, and thus turning the hook into a circle or loop, as: Dun, den, dunes, danced, Dunster, pen, pens, extensive, expensive, spin, spins, penitent, spend, glens, glens, enact.

99. The circle represents s only between two consonants, thus is is not pus-m but p-s-m, as in the word opossum. Therefore, when us occurs medially both letters must be shown, as: ransom, density.

100. The circle s is added to the hook n attached to curved consonants and to the hook f attached to straight consonants by writing the circle inside the hook; thus, fine, fine, prison, pull, drive, grievous, reign.

101. In order to distinguish between nz and ns, etc., after a curved consonant, as in vans(z) and Vance(s), the stroke n must be used for anse, ense, inse, or ance, ence, inse, thus, vans but Vance; manse but ministry. This distinction does not apply to l when coming after another consonant, and the hook is used in such outlines for ns; thus, balance.

102. The large circle ses and the loops st and str cannot be written inside the small n and f hooks; therefore, nsez, nst, and nstr, following a curved consonant, must be expressed by the stroke n with the large circle or loop attached; thus, fences, tened, banes, lained.

Leinster.

Exercise 32

1. d d da da da da d d

Exercise 33

1. Pins, spoons, bounced, brains, tuns, trains, grains. 2. Jones, dunces, pounce, pounces, winsome. 3. Fens, offence, lens, lance, nines, ninnies, derives, Buffs. 4. Prudence, opulence, summons, science, lines, violence. 5. Men brave the perils of the sky in balloons, and of the waves in skiffs, if they may perchance gain eminence as scientists. 6. The archives of many societies give instances of vigilance and endurance in the pursuit of truth on the meanest allowance.

REVIEW.

1. By what sign is n added to a straight consonant and a curved consonant respectively? 2. By what sign is f or v added to a straight consonant? 3. How is a circle or loop added to n on a straight consonant; and how in the case of curved consonants? 4. How is the circle s added to f or v in the case of straight consonants? 5. Write offences, regrets, fence.

-Tion Hook

103. The termination -tion, also variously written -sion, -cian, -tian, -sian, etc., which ends over 2,000 English words, is expressed by a large final hook; thus Udition, fashion, mission, caution, Persian. The circle s is added thus, nations, additions.

104. When -tion hook follows a curved consonant it is written inside the curve, like the final n hook; thus, fusion, vision, session, motion, notion.

105. When -tion follows a simple straight consonant, the hook is written on the side opposite to the LAST vowel; thus, passion, option, occasion, auction, diction, education, aberration, duration.

106. When -tion follows a straight letter which begins with a hook, circle, or loop, or springs from the curves tion hook is written on the opposite side, to preserve the straightness of the letter; thus, abrasion, repletion, attrition, citation, Grecian, section, affection, location.

107. After t, d, or j, not beginning with a hook, circle, or loop, the -tion hook is written on the RIGHT side, irrespective of the vowel; thus, dictation, rotation, degradation, magician.

108. The -tion hook is used medially, as additional, dictionary, auctioneer, cautionary, actionary, actionable, devotional, affectionate, national, optional.

109. When -tion follows the circle s or ns, it is expressed by continuing the circle on the other side of the consonant so as to form a small hook; thus, Second-place dot vowels between the circle and -tion are written OUTSIDE the hook; third-place vowels are written INSIDE the hook; thus, possession, position, musician, accession, evolution, invasion, authorization, dispensation, transition. First-place vowels do not occur between s and the syllable -tion.

110. The circle s may be added to this hook; thus, positions, suppositions, musicians; and the hook may be used medially; thus, positional, transitional.

111. When two distinct vowel signs occur immediately before -tion, write sh and the hook n, in order to accommodate the vowel signs; thus, valuation, extension, tuition.

112. The student is recommended to purchase the Key to the Short-hand Instructor, which forms a Key to all the Exercises appearing in these lessons, as well as to all the Review Questions. It is an indispensable companion for all students mastering the art without a teacher. The price of the Key is 50c., and all orders should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office. Lesson No. XII. will appear in the issue of June 11.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

C. H. R., Toronto, O., writes:
In answer to my earnest prayer, God has removed from my daily life that which was a constant grief to me.

D. S. H., Boston, Mass., writes:

I can truly say with the Psalmist, "This poor man cried and the Lord heard him and saved him out of all his troubles." I am constrained to write this to you. I have been a constant reader of the "Answered Prayers" column. Many a time have I been encouraged in the battle of life by the experiences here related. For a long time I have been in circumstances of severe trial—almost overwhelmed. I have held to prayer, believing that he claim, "Give us this day our daily bread," was as fully authorized as a petition by our Saviour, as "Thy kingdom come," although all those around me think that spiritual blessings are the only ones for which we should pray. I prayed on I worked, and God blessed my labor. Help came in such a way that I cannot but see it was in answer to my prayer.

Mother, Beaver Dam, Ky., writes:

I prayed the Lord for my daughter's conversion, and he heard and answered me. She has publicly confessed Christ.

Mrs. S. J., Missionary worker, New York City, writes:

Last year, I carried many children up to the Bible House to be taken to Mont-Lawn—nearly two hundred altogether. At least twice as many begged to go—needed to go; but I had to tell them no, with an aching heart, for there was not room. I have been praying a long time that the way might be opened for the Home to be enlarged. I know of many other workers who have been praying the same way. And now, I hear that a good friend—one of the Lord's servants—is giving the money to build another cottage at Mont-

Lawn. God is faithful to hear his servants and to own his own work.

F. A. B., Irene, Ga., writes:

I have received an answer to prayer to-day, which brings joy and pleasure to our home.

E. E. W., Paxinos, Pa., writes:

I have more faithfully prayed to God since I have been reading "Answered Prayers." I have been greatly encouraged. I prayed God to take a great temptation out of my life. And he heard and answered.

M. C. Parsons, Kans., writes:

To be honest, I must say that when I first began to read "Answered Prayers" I did not like the idea of publishing them; but when great trouble overtook me, the first thing that entered my mind was a certain answered prayer that I had read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I prayed earnestly day and night to God to hear and answer me, as he had heard and answered in that case, and he has answered. Now the column has come to be to me a little "experience" or "class" meeting. I believe many are strengthened by it.

Aunt Sarah, Table Grove, Ill., writes:
I have been, and continue to be, relieved of a great affliction, in answer to earnest prayer.

P. N. H., Denver, Colo., writes:

We were in great trouble, a trouble that it seemed we could not live under. For many months, almost a constant fountain of prayer was going up for deliverance. And it came in his own good time, and his way, a short time ago. Please print this for the comfort of other troubled ones.

W. H. C., Peoria, Ill., writes:

I prayed God I might find work that gave me the privilege of keeping my Sunday—a privilege I had not had for four years. God answered my prayer.

The Needle's Eye

BY FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Chapter XXVIII.—For Better or for Worse

LATER in the day on which Hilda had her interview with the Postmaster, as Miss Amelia Hurd was washing up the tea-dishes in her stepmother's kitchen, a slim figure in a pink gown appeared in the open door. "Law, Hilda, is that you?" cried the young woman, a tinge of embarrassment in her tones. "Won't you sit down in the parlor; I'll be through in a minute." Unconsciously she had begun to swing a new censer before her favorite shrine.

Hilda frowned. "Why should I go in the parlor," she said crossly. "I want to tell you something, 'Melie; then I'm going straight home and to bed; I'm tired to death."

A recent interview with Mr. Job Winters, while it had relieved her most poignant anxieties, had not improved her temper. She felt sore and humiliated from head to foot, though the pink envelope, as well as the blue, with their faithful contents, had been scattered to the winds of heaven an hour since in pieces no bigger than a five-cent piece. She had paid Mr. Winters the stipulated price; whereupon the youth had promptly proposed marriage, urging as a glittering inducement the fact that he had committed a penal offense in her behalf, for which one kiss seemed a totally inadequate compensation. "I shall tell pa, an' he'll han' me over to the constable," whined Mr. Winters. "Then you'll be subponed fur a witness; an' I guess the judge c'd make ye tell 'bout them letters fas' 'nough."

"That is all perfectly absurd, Job Winters," Hilda had said coolly. "You'll do nothing of the kind. If you did I should say you were telling lies; you couldn't prove a single thing." With that she had terminated the interview, leaving the unfortunate Job to fabricate as many tales as he might find convenient and necessary to explain the unlawful detention of the mail.

Nevertheless, the day's doings had shaken her small soul in a most unpleasant way, agitation of any sort being as repugnant to Hilda as cold water to a cat. Hence the unwonted dissonance in her soft voice as she addressed Miss Hurd. "I wish you'd come here and listen," she said imperiously.

Miss Hurd wiped her hands on her checkered apron, and approached the door with a fatuous smile. "My, ain't it too romantic for anything," she gurgled. "It reminds me of that story 'bout—"

"Do be quiet, 'Melie, and listen to what I say. I don't want you should mention this thing to a single soul; do you hear?"

"I can't see why you're so awful private 'bout everything," began Miss Hurd, tossing her head. "I sh'd think you'd be so proud, you'd—"

"Do you want me to invite you to visit me after I'm married, 'Melie?"

"Course I do; I sh'd think you'd want to, anyhow; havn't I always—"

"You'll never step your foot inside my house as long as you live, if you don't do as I say!"

"I haven't told."

"Very well, don't tell. I won't have my affairs in everybody's mouth."

"What under the sun was the matter with you this afternoon, Hil?" asked Miss Hurd, with a conciliating smile. "You scared me most to death, you acted so queer. Aren't you glad I found that paper?"

"Yes, oh yes!" breathed Hilda, fervently. "I—I was so surprised I hardly knew what I was doing. But it's all right now; and I'll—yes; I'll do something handsome for you some day, 'Melie." Her usual manner had returned, and her violet eyes as they rested on her friend were sleepily soft and sweet as usual.

"I s'pose you'll have di'mon's an' pearls an' carriages, an' everything elegant," sighed the other, enviously. "My, it does beat all what luck you always have, Hil."

Hilda moved her plump shoulders slightly. It appeared to her that as Providence had begun by endowing her with transcendent and all-conquering beauty, all the rest should be, as it were, thrown in. She had, therefore, accepted her prospective grandeur with the same calmness with which she had eaten her breakfast. "I suppose he wished to keep it a secret from me on purpose," she said, meditatively. "After we're married he'll probably take me to an elegant house, and tell me everything."

"It's just too awfully romantic for anything!" exclaimed Miss Hurd; "and to think I found it out the way I did!"

"That is the reason that I want nobody to know," pursued Hilda, sweetly. "I shouldn't like to spoil his plans."

"Aren't you going to tell him that you've found out?"

"No, indeed, I'm not; but I'm glad I know."

"You're the queerest girl!" murmured Miss Hurd.

This secret fund of information was very supporting to Hilda during the somewhat trying days that followed. It gave a sweet dignity and aloofness to her mien in the final unpleasant interview with Mr. Snider, in which she informed that young gentleman that she had thought long and seriously over the matter, with the result that she could never be his.

When the unhappy youth begged to know whether there was "another"—this being the usual procedure, though for what reason it is hard to guess—she said gently but firmly that there was. She added that she had learned to know her own heart, and while that heart was overflowing with the warmest sisterly affection for Mr. Snider, she could never be his in any nearer relation.

Hilda was now agreeably sure in her own mind that she loved Immanuel with ardor and devotion; and those of us who live in glass houses should not throw stones. Her maiden heart beat with just as sweet an agitation as yours, Madam and the Misses Grundy, ever did on a like occasion as she perused the daily letters she had once found "tiresome."

Her own epistles, sent as regularly, breathed, with the faint odor of violets, depths of maidenly sweetness, which Immanuel Rossi had only guessed at heretofore. These letters of Hilda's did not err in being vulgarly affectionate, it must be understood. They were a model of prudent reserve; they hinted at much; they said nothing in particular; which was quite as it should have been. These dainty pink, pale blue and cream-white bits of paper served as the most effectual fans in the world to keep Immanuel Rossi's infatuation at the white heat of enthusiasm, and they brought him at length to the little village whose post-mark they bore—if not on the wings of love, on the fastest train available.

When Hilda set her eyes on the man whom she had come very easily to regard as a "magnificent specimen of American manhood," tears of real joy filled her blue eyes; she nestled naturally and sweetly against his broad shoulder, and felt as happy as a girl can be expected to feel under such blissful circumstances. This particular "caprice of a multi-millionaire" was, she felt, altogether as it should be. And when, later in the day, her lover some what shamefacedly produced a tiny case from his waistcoat pocket, and fitted a sparkling diamond on her white finger, why her cup of joy fairly brimmed over. She said nothing, however, which was again quite as it should have been, for it gave Immanuel Rossi the opportunity to say a great deal.

"I fear you will think me very extravagant, dear," he whispered. And indeed the jewel was not strictly in keeping with the role upon which he had fixed. "I saw it one day in a shop window, and it reminded me of you, sweet; it was so pure and sparkling."

Hilda smiled shyly. "I hope you will always love me as much as you do now," she said with a pretty wistfulness.

"How can I help but love you more and more, dearest," he answered fervently. Then he began to tell her at length of the changes and improvements he had been making in the little house on the back hill-road. He wound up by asking if they might not be married immediately. "I have so much to show my wife, and so much to tell her that the time seems long."

Hilda's eyes under her long curled lashes seemed on the instant to reflect the fire that shot from her diamond. Yet she answered with the sweetest propriety, that it must be just as papa said.

Papa had been disagreeably short and crusty in the beginning; indeed, he had pooh-poohed the idea of Hilda's marriage quite sharply, when the young lady had herself broached the matter before her lover's arrival.

"I've heard all I want to about this young man from your grandfather," he said with unpleasant emphasis. "He tells which exactly matched the severely simple traveling gown.

That truly invaluable innate sense of the eternal fitness of things, which is as much a birthright as the color of one's eyes, had served the young woman admirably on previous occasions; it came to her rescue once more, when Immanuel murmured in her ear that they were going at once to their own little home on the back hill-road.

"Shall we—shall we always live in that house?" asked Hilda tremulously.

"'Always' is a long word, dear," said Immanuel, with a searching look into the exquisite drooping face. "I cannot tell."

He was silent for a long time after this, and Hilda in a noiseless tumult of hope and fear looked quietly out of the window.

They were set down that evening at sunset—these two who were strangers, but who believed themselves united in life's tenderest tie—before the old house on the back hill-road. It was no longer a shabby, me his farm is run down to nothing, and that the fellow knows next to nothing about managing it. It won't do."

"IT WAS NO LONGER A SHABBY, PATHETIC OLD HOUSE"

"But it will do, papa," said Hilda, with quiet positiveness; "Mr. Rossi is quite able to take care of me, I am sure."

Mr. Rossi himself in a private interview with Mr. Wilde, evidently convinced that gentleman of his ability to make good Hilda's confidence in him. The girl observed a puzzled look in the paternal eyes as they rested upon her some hours later. "You are a lucky girl, Hil," he had briefly said, "You've played your cards uncommonly well."

At which Hilda smiled in her own charmingly non-committal way. "I can't think what you mean, dear papa," she said sweetly. "But I'm glad you are not going to break my heart."

And so it came to pass that on a cool bright day, in early autumn, Immanuel Rossi was journeying with the most charming bride that, in his opinion, he could have found anywhere in the world. The young man felt blissfully sure of this, as his eyes rested proudly on the sweet flower-like face beneath the modest hat pathetic old house; even Hilda was roused from the apathy of her fear and disappointment to a momentary pleasure as she beheld the astonishing changes that had taken place both inside and out. The environing mayweed had given place to stretches of velvet turf; the straggling lilacs were pruned; the modest walls shone in a coat of new paint; bay-windows jutted out here and there. Within, fresh paint, paper and some tasteful pieces of furniture had wrought wonders in the old-fashioned rooms. It was sweet and comfortable and homelike enough to have pleased a more fastidious woman than Hilda. "After all," she thought, "it must be true; it cost a great deal of money to do even this; and it is certainly a romantic idea to spend our honeymoon here."

Her pretty head straightened itself like a drooping flower refreshed by rain; her blue eyes shone with joy.

"Do you like it, dear?" asked Immanuel anxiously.

"I think it is lovely," answered Hilda honestly.

Question of the Week

Which is the purest, the most unselfish and the truest—the love of the sexes, the love between two friends, or the love that exists between parents and children, and which of the three is capable of the greatest sacrifice?

Friendship the Master Love

The love between two friends. Love of sex is a beautiful earthly blossom, and withers in this world, the Bible tells us; but a genuine friendship is divine and eternal. Sexual love is selfish, and only true when resting on a basis of friendship. Parental love is also selfish. The love of a mother for her offspring, while beautiful, is, indeed, love of self, an animal instinct. Friendship is capable of the greatest sacrifice, since it is the only love in which the element of self can be eliminated.

M. H.

Mother Love is a Divine Love

The love of husband and wife should be the purest, truest, and most unselfish. It should be a union of heart and soul. There are many such marriages, the late President McKinley and wife being one. The love of friends sometimes shows great loyalty and devotion, but it is selfish. The love that exists between parents and children is naturally strong and unselfish; but the love of the true mother is capable of the greatest self-sacrifice. She will love her children when no one else will. Her love never fails them, and it is nearest to the Divine love.

SARAH A. FALL.

Maternal Love the Noblest

The love between parent and offspring. Home and mother mean more even than sweetheart and wife, for husband and wife are supremely happy only as father and mother. Many noble lovers have had several successive sweethearts, and more than one devoted wife in a lifetime; but a man cannot have more than one true mother here below. Gontcharoff, a Russian writer, says friendship is the beginning or the end of love; and we would define it further as a happy medium between sex love and parental affection, intermingling with and making both these ideal. But it is not so powerful an impulse as these. David was a lover, a friend, and a father; but the most touching of all relations was that sustained toward his wayward son Absalom. The delineation of Deity as the God who "so loved the world," is essentially maternal; and as sons of God through Christ, we are more privileged and happy than even was Abraham, the friend of God. Christ's lament over Jerusalem was maternal, or paternal, whichever one pleases; and Schopenhauer says the anxiety for and love toward humanity evinced by every noble order of genius, is certainly a divine manifestation of the maternal instinct.

LUCIEN V. RULE.

Parental Love the Highest Love

Parental love is the purest, the most unselfish, the truest, and capable of the greatest sacrifice. "The love that gave Jesus to die" was parental love. The Heavenly Father "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." There are exceptions where friendship, and the love between man and woman reaches the highest point of sacrifice, even to the laying down of life itself; but in most instances the love of father and mother for their children is the most faithful. It prompts them to every sacrifice, and is capable of unwavering devotion through sickness, affliction, or defeat. Friends may become estranged; a little trouble, a little disagreement, and the love between men and women will die; but parental love, of which the love of God the Father is the crowning type, endures through every phase of life, on past the grave, and into eternity.

ALICE F. BOYNTON.

The Sacrifices of Mother-Love

The pure love of the sexes has caused one to make great self-sacrifices for the other. True love between friends has been proved by the mutual self-sacrifices in the hour of need. See the love of Ruth for Naomi, sacrificing friends, home and idols to be the companion of a poor homeless widow. Also, the love of David and Jonathan. He might have regarded David as his rival instead of a friend. Jonathan risked the wrath of the king, his father, in his love for David, their love "surpassing the love of women." But the love of parents for their children is natural, implanted in the human heart by God. The parents' happiness is bound up in their children's happiness, and for them they will make the greatest sacrifices, not only for the pretty, healthy child, but more particularly for the afflicted one who is solely dependent on their loving care; not only for the good child but for the "wandering boy," for whom their hearts yearn constantly. How intense was the love of David for his rebellious son: "Would God I had died for thee." The greatest self-sacrifices have been made by poor mothers for their children in order to give them advantages that would elevate them in life. S. F. ELLIOTT.

Mother Love the Purest

Mother love I hold to transcend all other love, and represents, to my perception or imagination, a perfect and beautiful embodiment of Christ-life. A child is a part of one's self; and with the usual selfishness to which human nature is inclined, how tenderly indulgent a parent's love, forgetting what is faulty and weak—keeping by force of affection in a higher place than they could otherwise aspire to, and a type of divine love.

DORA W. DELAMATER.

The Love That Forgives All

Isaiah compared the love of a mother with the love of God when he said, "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee." And David said, "As a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." As Christ forgives every repentant sinner, and washes away his sins as though they had never been, just so will a mother's love embrace a wayward child, and not only forgive, but forget, and be ready to love and trust, as in days gone by. The story of the prodigal son shows to the greatest advantage a father's love, and symbolizes the love of God towards man. The love of the sexes may grow cold, in many cases even turn to hate. The love between two friends, though deep and noble, if not constantly revived, will be but a sweet remembrance as the years pass on. The love of a mother never grows cold, never dies, is as unchangeable as the love of God.

love, and by his comparisons He beatified all human love (Matt. 12: 50; Jno. 15: 15; Eph. 5: 20; Rev. 21: 2). Men, in their need, under the culminative stress of their weakness, want and unworth are to come to "Our Father," as Jesus taught them. From this, may we not infer that the love of a parent is the purest, most unselfish, truest and capable of the greatest sacrifice. The love that exists between friends—and even fraternal and conjugal love may, and frequently does, become weakened or estranged through neglect or misapprehension, and sometimes from so slight cause as the mere lack of expression; but the love of the parent—especially the mother—never knows any abatement. However mistaken, unworthy or degraded and treacherous he may become, the heart of Monica still clings to her son, and David mourns for Absalom.

M. R. D. DINGWALL.

The Only Love that Never Fails

Life's history is a story of false friendship, and the court records are recitals of numerous broken vows. But there are few parents who desert their children. It is a divine plan that the love of the parents should exceed all earthly love. Even when the children wander away from the parental instruction, it is the parents who will bid them welcome to their very best, forgetting the long nights of watching and hoping; forgetting that much of their life has gone out for them. When the world frowns upon the wayfarer, the parents heed it not, for their great love covers all. Truly, no love will admit of so great a sacrifice as that of the parent for the child. No other such love ever was known, except the love of God.

Miscellaneous Questions

Margaret G. Low, of the Grace M. E. Church Flower and Fruit Mission, N. Y. writes:

Through your paper, I found a long-lost niece out in Wisconsin, and it has brought great joy to her and to myself. In unexpected ways God shows he is with you while sowing the seed, but how great the harvest will be, no man can tell.

Student, Northfield, Mass. What is the difference between an ode and a sonnet?

An ode is a poem suitable for singing and of being set to music. It is the equivalent of a lyric poem. A sonnet is a short poem of not less nor more than fourteen lines. They were formerly chiefly of an amatory character, but that element is not essential to the sonnet.

Baptist, Chicago. Why do Episcopalians bow the head when the name of Christ is mentioned in the recitation of the creed?

The custom is believed to have arisen at the time when there was widespread doubt about the divinity of Christ. It would be regarded as indicating the worshiper's open expression of belief in the doctrine. It was probably also connected with the words of Paul, which may have been regarded as an injunction: "At the name of Jesus, every knee should bow" (Phil. 2: 10).

S. S. Teacher, Philadelphia, Pa. Christ mentions Chorazin (Matt. 11: 21) as a place in which he did mighty works. I find no mention in the Gospels of his having visited a town by that name. Where is the record?

There is no record of Christ having visited Chorazin. This mention of the place shows how far the Gospels are from being complete narratives of Christ's life. He had evidently been there and worked miracles, yet none of the four evangelists describes the visit. The author of the Fourth Gospel admits the incomplete character of his own work (John 21: 25) and says that if all Jesus said and did had been written, the books needed would have been more than the world could contain (that is could profitably use). The site of Chorazin was unknown until recently, when Dr. Robinson identified it with Kherza, a ruined town three miles from Capernaum.

What is the chief lesson taught by the serial, "The Needle's Eye"?

The chief lesson which I meant to teach, is that "it is harder for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom"; but "with God all things are possible." FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY.

B. L. B., Greenfield, Ind. There is a difference of opinion in our Sunday School, as to whether the Jews or Gentiles crucified our Saviour. Will you please answer and settle the matter for us?

He was tried and condemned to death by the Jewish Sanhedrin, but the Jewish ecclesiastics had no power to impose the death penalty. That power belonged to the Roman court. The Jews accordingly charged Christ with treason against Rome. He was arrested by Roman soldiers, guarded by Roman soldiers throughout the trial and escorted by them to Calvary. John 19: 23 distinctly says the soldiers crucified him. Mark 15: 16-24, Matt. 27: 27-36 corroborate this. In all these acts, the Roman governor and soldiery were executors of Roman laws which the Jews had no power to carry out. The Jews, however, demanded the execution, accepting all responsibility for the consequences (see Matt. 27: 25).

Anxious, Schenectady, N. Y. Can a Christian mother say too much to her children, so that when they make homes for themselves they will ignore the house of God and never attend church? I have brought my children up to attend Sunday School and church; have kept the home pure; have given them a good education and taught them to be self-supporting, and now they feel they are good moral men and have no need of a Christ. I have prayed for their conversion thirty-five years.

Many Christian parents are undergoing similar disappointment. Comparatively few have cause to reproach themselves with having "said too much" about religion to their children. A more common cause, and one that is much more culpable, is that they have said too little. You are spared that self-reproach, for which you should be thankful. Having done your duty, as you saw it, you must leave the result with God. The time will probably come, when in sorrow or suffering, the teaching of their Christian mother will come to mind and they will seek her Saviour. By all means continue to pray for them, and comfort yourself with the assurance that if a parent "trains up a child in the way he should go, when he is old he will not depart from it." We hope that with them at least the change will come before they are too old to be of service in the Lord's cause.

Omer W. Antelope, Tex. The answer is the letter "h."

S. T. J., West Carroll, La. A cometic shower, most probably.

J. C. P., Susquehanna, Pa. Marconi's name is pronounced as though written Mar-co-nee, with accent on second syllable.

J. W. Hill, Carthage, Mo., would like to receive from some reader a copy of the old-fashioned verses on the "Books of the Bible," beginning—"In Genesis the world was made."

P. McO., Nashville, Mich. Anyone who upholds the saloon party cannot consistently claim to be a friend of temperance, nor can he hold the confidence of temperance people.

J. P. C., Laurel Hill, Va. We see no harm in the clean and unobjectionable amusements mentioned in your letter, if conducted under proper restrictions, and if intoxicants and gambling are rigidly excluded.

W. J. McC. 1. One who sins deliberately, knowing that he is sinning, is assuredly more guilty than one who sins unknowingly. 2. All games that lead to gambling are objectionable and should be avoided.

Ira M. O., Parsons, Kan. To your last question, we reply that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD exercises the greatest care to exclude from its advertising columns all advertisements which it does not regard as entirely trustworthy.

Reader, Ontario, Calif. When all other measures fail, the chronic drunkard ought to be placed under restraint. If neither moral suasion nor personal appeals avail, restraint would seem to be the only means remaining. It would afford an opportunity to reach his sober understanding and his heart and conscience.

Howard D., Smock, Pa. We cannot believe any one acts for the best who chooses a lot in life which involves the sacrifice of the Lord's Day to business pursuits. There are many things considered necessary nowadays which are not really so, and the product of much Sunday labor belongs to this class. We do not believe that secular labor performed on Sunday ever brings a blessing, but the reverse.

Mrs. M. L., Pilot Grove, Mo. There are doubtless many who criticize Mr. Carnegie's methods, and several have suggested that he might do better even than erect costly libraries; but we do not consider the criticism applicable. Mr. Carnegie cannot please everybody. It must be admitted that the one thing he does, he does well, and there are few things in this world of greater value to the general public than good free libraries. Other philanthropists may excel in different lines; why not give him credit for the line he has chosen and made peculiarly his own?

THE NEW MODERATOR

Dr. Henry Van Dyke, of Princeton, Elected by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church

THE moderatorship, which is the highest honor in the gift of the Presbyterian Church, has this year been conferred on Dr. Henry Van Dyke. That it is a high honor is fully conceded by every Presbyterian minister in the land. It is not so much in the power that it places in the hands of its recipient as in the recognition of unusual ability and as an expression of confidence in the fairness and impartiality of the man who is chosen. The election of Dr. Van Dyke was all the more remarkable because of the absence among his supporters of the methods which are popularly considered conducive to success. The canvassing and wire-pulling which were witnessed on all hands, as if the General Assembly had been a political convention, were not employed in the interest of Dr. Van Dyke. Yet on the second ballot he was elected.

The numbers on the first ballot showed that five candidates had supporters in the Assembly. These were: Dr. James D. Moffatt, President of Washington University, Pennsylvania, who received 144 votes; Dr. Richard S. Holmes, of Pittsburgh, for whom 90 votes were cast; Dr. David W. Kerr, of Bellevue, Alaska, who had 86 votes; and Dr. H. Duffield, of New York, who received 61 votes. Dr. Van Dyke received 217 votes on that ballot, which were increased to 298 votes on the second ballot, and that number being a majority of all the votes cast, secured his election. The result was considered as a victory for that section of the Assembly which favors a revision of its time-honored creed. It is contended, however, that the vote for Moderator was not drawn on lines connected with the question of revision, but that many who are opposed to any change in the creed voted for Dr. Van Dyke because they held him in high esteem for his personal qualities. That matter will be decided when the report of the Revision Committee is submitted to a vote of the Assembly.

Dr. Van Dyke is comparatively a young man to occupy so distinguished a position. It was only twenty-five years ago that he graduated from the Seminary at Princeton and received his license to preach. So eminent, however, was the position that he took in the religious world and in the world of letters, that he received the degree of doctor of divinity from the three universities of Princeton, Harvard and Yale, an honor almost unprecedented among Presbyterian clergymen. His first pastorate was at Newport, which, after three years of successful labor, he quitted to become pastor of the Brick Church in New York. His literary attainments, his chaste eloquence, and his intense earnestness attracted large audiences to the historic edifice, and it was with sincere regret that the church accepted his resignation on his call to a professorship in Princeton. His friend, Dr. Maltbie Babcock, succeeded him. Since Dr. Babcock's death the church has been without a pastor. It offered Dr. Van Dyke a munificent salary if he would resume the pastorate. He consented, on the strange condition that he should serve without a salary, but should retain his professor's chair at Princeton.

Dr. Van Dyke's influence on the Committee of Revision has been of a conciliatory character. It is recognized that he is in favor of a revision of the creed, but his courtesy and deference to his opponents have been so marked that he has won many of them over, and it is mainly due to his tact and conciliation that the committee has presented a unanimous report to the Assembly. His acceptance of the honor of the moderatorship was characterized by the modesty that is so conspicuous a trait of his character. He said:

Moderator, fathers and brethren: I thank you all most heartily for giving me the privilege in this place, made sacred to me by the memory of my father. I cannot account for my having been brought here except that some of the older ones among you thought that you were voting for my father. I have always been short, and I will try to be short in this speech. I have not deserved this honor which you have given me, and I ask you to do your best to help me to be fair, loyal and true to the church in which I was born and which I love with all my heart.

TALKS OUT.

Doctor Talks About Food.

It is often the case that doctors themselves drift into bad habits of food and drink although they know better, but doctors are human you know like the rest of us, but when they get into trouble they generally know better how to get out of it, and the "food route" is a common one among them.

Dr. H. Barber of Laurel, Ind. concluded that coffee and badly selected food was the cause of his stomach trouble and his loss of weight from 184 pounds to 153 pounds with nerves impaired and general nervous breakdown.

He did not give coffee up at once but began the use of Grape-Nuts and says, "Within a month I could see a wonderful change had taken place due to the use of the new food. I decided to give up coffee and use Postum in its place. So regularly for a time I have been on a breakfast made up of Grape-Nuts, a little graham bread, and Postum Food Coffee. My weight has increased to 174 pounds, my stomach trouble has entirely gone and my mind is clear and vigorous as ever. Wishing you every success I beg to assure you of my warm appreciation of Grape-Nuts and Postum."

is no suitable camping-ground at its base for the hosts of Israel. We, accordingly, concluded that its identification with Mt. Sinai is unsatisfactory. The view, of course, from its summit was enchanting, north, south, east, and west. Here we caught our first glimpse of the Sinai group—massive, variegated, imposing—standing in the centre of a mountainous chain of numberless peaks, some higher, some smaller. Returning to camp, we photographed the oasis with care, securing the best view from the hill on which Moses sat when he witnessed the battle, and then proceeded up the valley on our way to Jebel Musa. The most luxurious and interesting portion of the oasis of Feiran was still before us. Hundreds of palm trees, some over seventy feet tall, and perfectly straight, water in superabundance, reeds and cat-tails, ducks swimming about, stone hovels and gardens, Egyptian shadoufs (a contrivance for raising water), a mosque, and a cemetery; few living inhabitants, however, though Risq assured us that when the dates begin to ripen, at least a thousand Arabs then occupy the valley; more huts, a few tents, and a flock of goats and sheep with shepherdesses, morrains of yellow clay, of great interest geologically, showing that once the oasis was not improbably a lake—these and many others were the features which especially arrested the eye.

We passed out of Wady Feiran and into Wady Solaf, which leads directly over a pass, called Nakb Howa, to Sinai. But one day yet remained between us and the Mount of the Law. As we journeyed slowly on, the thought occurred to us that we might enhance our appreciation of Moses' decalogue by attempting to construct a new one of our own. The attempt was successful, for we were forced, after several futile efforts, to conclude that the Ten Commandments of Moses are far more comprehensive than men think.

The pass over Nakb Howa was too steep and too difficult for our loaded caravan; accordingly, they went around by Wady esh-Sheikh. In places, however, there was a paved road twelve feet broad, and frequently water and pasture; also inscriptions here and there upon the boulders. From the summit of the pass we got our first near view of Mount Sinai. Descending, we came out upon the great plain of Er-Rahah, where Israel doubtless encamped before the Mount. The average width of the plain is perhaps not more than half a mile, but its length is nearly three. It is undulating, composed of hard sand or gravel, tufted over with desert plants, and well watered. A natural mound near the base of the Musa group, suggested the "bounds" which were set by Moses to prevent the people from touching the Mount (cf. Exod. 19:12). Near by is the junction of three valleys, Wady ed-Deir, or the valley of Jethro on the north side, running east and west; Wady el-Leja on the southwest; and Wady esh-Sheikh leading north. The hill of Aaron, on which he is said to have set up the golden calf, is located at the same junction. We halted for luncheon at this point.

"Here," said Hanna, "is where the Israelites changed their religion." A few minutes from this point brought us to the garden terraces of the Convent of St. Catharine, where, after formally presenting our letters of introduction from the Greek Patriarch in Cairo, we were welcomed by the Oikonomos and invited to pitch our camp in the gardens of the Monastery. We accepted of his invitation and remained four days, spending the time in climbing and exploration.

CHRISTIANS IN COUNCIL

The First Conference of the Church
Called to Settle a Dispute

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHEN a church is prospering and making advances in the divine life, the enemy tries in some way to thwart it. He did so in the first Gentile church at Antioch. Certain men, possessed with strong Jewish prejudices, came down from Judæa, not in any way sent by the church at Jerusalem; and they taught the assemblies of the brethren, "Except ye be circumcised after the custom of Moses, ye cannot be saved." This teaching produced dissension and questioning. It may have been a time of deep sorrow and humbling to Paul and Barnabas to find that the church at Antioch so little understood "the Gospel of the grace of God" that they should become divided on the question of a Jewish rite which had already been superseded. But they were ready to submit themselves to other Christian brethren in the fear of God (Eph. 5: 21), and so prove themselves to be filled with the Spirit (ver. 18). Finally, the brethren at Antioch determined to send them and other brethren to the apostles and elders of the church at Jerusalem about this question.

Arrived at Jerusalem, and being well received of the church, the apostles, and elders, they "rehearsed all things which God had done with them;" but the hornet's nest was stirred up, and the circumcision party, composed of believing Pharisees, the Ritualists of those days, were as determined to carry their point, and to insist that there was no salvation without becoming a Jew, and being circumcised, as the Romanists of our day are determined that there is no salvation outside the Church of Rome. This led to the sitting of the first Church Council. To begin with, there was much questioning, and no headway was made. Then Peter "rose up, and said unto them, Brethren, ye know how that a good while ago God made choice among you, that by my mouth the Gentiles should hear the Word of the Gospel and believe. And God, which knoweth the heart, bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost, even as he did unto us; and he made no distinction between us and them, cleansing their hearts by faith. Now, therefore, why tempt ye God, that ye should put a yoke on the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?"

It was an unanswerable appeal. The Gentiles have heard and believed; God has made no distinction between them and us; dare we make distinctions which he has not made? Later on, Paul showed that "there can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male and female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3: 28). How can the members of one body be separated, since they are interdependent for their very life, and the one life is in them all? Peter calls it tempting God to put a yoke upon the necks of the disciples. He argues that God, which knoweth the heart, "bare them witness." He knew what he did. If he accepted their faith without imposing circumcision, and gave them the Holy Ghost in their uncircumcised state, is it not a proof that circumcision is not obligatory for the believing child of God?

The day was won: the Spirit of God had spoken through Peter, and the questionings were hushed: "all the multitude kept silence." Nothing brings such a hush over an assembly as when God the Holy Spirit speaks through one of God's people. Human eloquence may be listened to breathlessly, but the moment the speaker stops, the influence stops also. But when God speaks, whole assemblies must keep silence before him. And Paul and Barnabas told out the signs and wonders which God had done among the Gentiles by them. Then James, who was probably the president, said: "Brethren, hearken unto me: Simon hath rehearsed how first God did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name." The light had broken on God's purpose for the Church. Jewish students of the Scriptures knew that the people of Israel were to be "set on high above all the nations of the earth." They had yet to learn that God had a people among the Gentiles.

COLLEGE COMPLEXIONS.

Can be Ruined by Coffee.

Nothing so surely mars a woman's complexion as coffee drinking. A young college girl of Hyattsville, Md., says, "I never drank coffee up to the time I went to college, and as long as you are not going to publish my name will admit that I was proud of my pink and white complexion, but for some reason I began drinking coffee at school and when vacation came I looked like a wreck. Was extremely nervous and my face hollow and sallow."

All my friends said college life had been too much for me. After questioning me about my diet, Mother gave me a cup of strong, rich coffee at breakfast, although formerly she had objected to the habit, but the secret came out in a few weeks when everybody began to comment on my improved looks and spirits. She said she had been steadily giving me Postum Food Coffee and I did not know it.

My color came back, much to my delight, and I was fully restored to health. I will return to college without the slightest fear of losing ground, for I know exactly where the trouble lies.

Mother says the first time she had Postum made no one would drink it, for it was pale and watery, but the next day she did not trust to the cook, but examined the directions and made it herself. She found the cook had just let it come to the boiling point and then served it, and it was tasteless, but the beverage made according to directions, by proper boiling, is delicious and has a remarkable 'taste for more.' One cup is seldom enough for Father now.

I have a young lady friend who suffered several years from neuralgia and headache, obtaining only temporary relief from medicines. Her sister finally persuaded her to leave off coffee and use Postum. She is now very pronounced in her views as to coffee. Says it was the one thing responsible for her condition, for she is now well and the headaches and neuralgia are things of the past. Please do not publish my name." Name can be given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Artistic Monuments

Cost No More than Plain Ones in

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Over $70,000 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers in the last few years.

THE TIMID SOUL

SO little of the Christ in me I find,
So poor my soul, so naked and so blind,
I wonder much, if in his hands will be
A robe of righteousness, for such as me.

So much of evil to my spirit clings,
So little do I seek God's better things,
I wonder oft, if in his house will be
A mansion and a crown, for such as me.

So seldom do I go with Christ apart,
So very weak and sinful is my heart,
I question much, if on his face will be
One sweet, one welcome smile for such as me.

To him who cleansed the leper I will go
For help and cleansing too. Oh, could I know,
That somewhere in his book of life would be
The name, writ clear and plain, of such as me.

"Called Higher"

"As members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family," writes Mrs. Ella Huddle, Galena, O., "we write you of the death of Daniel W. Huddle. He was born April 23, 1840, in this State. When quite young, he united with the M. E. Church, and was a faithful member to the day of his death, March 15, 1892. He leaves a wife and two children."

"There are angels in my room," said John W. Keeney, servant of the Lord, when the darkness of death gathered about him. He was hardly more than past his prime, but had been an invalid for almost a year, was weary and ready to go. "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," writes his widow from East Lynne, Conn., "was his comfort in his sickness."

A letter signed "J. L. Gilbert," and written from Springfield, Mass., says: "The paper has come to me ever since Mrs. J. H. Armatage, of Albany, N. Y., took it. December 31, 1901, in her eighty-eighth year, she was 'called higher.' She loved the paper, every word, and it was like a little talk with her to take it from the wrapper and look it through for her pencil marks. She was my mother's sister and dearly beloved."

When old "Father Reed" was laid to rest Sunday, March 9, hundreds who have known and loved him were gathered around his grave. "He bore the distinction of being the oldest Methodist minister and the oldest Odd Fellow in the United States," says the local historian at Champaign, Ill. Had he lived two years longer he would have been one hundred years old. At his funeral services, ministers of all denominations were present to pay tribute to his memory.

Ethel Williams was only thirteen when the death angel called her, but she was ready to go. The summons came suddenly and tragically. When she was out skating with young companions, a tree fell and the child was caught beneath. Putting her hands together while lying beneath it, she said, "Dear Lord, forgive all my sins." In moments of consciousness, while being borne to a doctor's office, she murmured about Jesus. In four hours from the time the tree crushed her, she fell asleep in Jesus. She was a charter member of the Junior Epworth League, at Vulcan, a little leader in good works, and will be sorely missed.

The oldest resident clergyman of Newburyport, Mass., went to be "forever with the Lord," when Rev. Dr. Charles E. Lord departed this life on February 19. He was eighty-five years old, and for over sixty years had preached the Gospel. The day before his death he was able to go to Amesbury. The messenger of death dealt gently with him and he suffered only a few hours. He was widely known and much beloved, as writer, teacher, and minister of God. His latest work was the establishment and maintenance of Hope Chapel at Salisbury Beach. At his funeral at North Church there was a great gathering of clergymen; and many people came from far and near to pay respect to his memory.

From Clyde, N. J., a friend writes: "Living alone in the country near here were Lydia C. Sickmond and her mother. I never saw more beautiful devotion than existed between them. They were very, very poor, but always cheerful and content. The daughter, a cripple, did all the household work—scrubbing, sweeping, washing, ironing, cooking, and making of beds, besides caring tenderly for her helpless mother. She did it all sitting in her wheel-chair and creeping on her knees. She crept on her knees outdoors to get wood and water and to spread clothes on the grass to dry. When the mother was called home a few months ago, the daughter was left all alone. Then Lydia came to Clyde, that she might be less lonely and might sometimes go to church. Here, she takes in plain sewing and fancy work to make her living, and is the same trustful, contented spirit she ever was. I felt that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would like to hear about this member of their family, the 'Cheerful Christian Cripple.'"

Mrs. P. D. Palmer, who departed this life in the year just closed, at the age of seventy-six, was noted for her kindness to her neighbors and her charity to all in need. Her son, Mr. John D. Palmer, Union City, Tenn., writes: "She was for years a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which all regard as a treasure in our home."

Know What Your Dealer Pays

THIS book tells pretty nearly what your dealer pays for everything. It quotes wholesale prices on 70,000 articles, and shows pictures of 17,000 of them. It includes practically everything that anybody uses, wears or eats; and its prices are the lowest ever quoted. It will save the average family at least $100.00 per year—some $500.00. Two million people send for this book yearly as a buying guide, and we want you to have one, too.

For 30 Years we have been selling merchandise by mail at about what dealers pay. Ours is the original catalogue business, and the greatest mail order house in the world. This enormous business has been gained and held by underselling everybody, treating customers fairly, and doing as we agree.

Two Million People are now numbered among our customers. We carry for them a stock valued at $2,500,000. We employ 2,000 clerks to fill their orders. It requires 100 typewriters to write our letters to them.

You Need This Book because you can rely on it. Other catalogues are offered you, but this one is best. Our house is the oldest and largest, and our prices are always the lowest. Our guarantee is the fairest, and our record of a quarter-century assures you of fair dealing. We keep our customers.

We Guarantee Satisfaction and safe delivery. Every article in our catalogue is described exactly as it is. Not the slightest exaggeration is ever permitted. But if anything you get doesn't suit you in quality, or price, or fit, send it back and we will replace it. Or we will send your money back, and pay transportation both ways. We consider no expense or effort too great to avoid having one dissatisfied customer.

THIS BOOK CONTAINS

70,000 Prices 17,000 Pictures 1,000 Pages

Two Thousand Stores in One

whole cost of selling the same goods to 2,000 separate stores, scattered everywhere. The fiercest competition in America centers in the effort to get our trade. The prices we pay are never much above cost; and goods that we cannot buy low enough are made in factories of our own. Is it any wonder that we can sell for about what common dealers pay? We get along with a fraction of the profit charged by stores. We have no salesmen—no selling expense save our catalogue. A dealer must make several times as much on each article to pay his expenses and live. Our expense is but a small percentage when spread over sales that amount to millions of dollars annually.

Two thousand average dealers together will not buy so much in a year as we. The makers who sell to us have no traveling expense, no credit risk, no losses, no salesmen to pay. They save the waste of the modern method of business, and the buying of the 20th century will be done more and more by mail! In this way we are now saving our customers from four to five million dollars annually. You will become one of those customers when you see this book.

Miscellaneous Questions

L. F. York, Neb. In a household where the mother is a professing Christian, but the father is not, ought the wife to ask a blessing at the table, if it offends the husband; or, ought she, considering him the head of the house, to ask the blessing when he is away and she left in charge of the house?

If the unbelieving husband be offended, let the wife ask the blessing silently, while he is present, and teach her children to do the same. It is almost inconceivable, however, that any husband, having the slightest regard for his wife, would hurt her feelings in such a matter. A man with such a disposition would be a boor indeed.

E. W. D., Dunbridge, O. 1. How did Easter get its name, and its meaning? 2. Also Good Friday?

1. April was called Oster-monat (the month of the east wind) and Easter derives its name from this old appellation, the Anglo-Saxon form of the word being Eastre. The heathen goddess Ostara was supposed to be the tutelary divinity of springtime. 2. "Good Friday" means "Holy Friday," the anniversary of the Crucifixion; hence the name which is still retained.

A. C. Marshfield, Oreg. The only work that is justifiable on the Lord's Day is that which can properly be classed as a work of necessity or of mercy. This indicates a line of definition which no one need misunderstand. So, whether one be running a dairy, keeping store, or conducting a transportation company, if the activities of the Lord's Day be conscientiously limited to the performance of such duties as are absolutely imperative (and which should have no relation to money-making, trading or bartering) the matter becomes clearer. "Thou shalt do no work, thou nor thy man servant," etc., implies a complete cessation of ordinary labor and the laying down of all routine employments. Our Saviour's example justifies us in claiming that the only exceptions to the rule should be acts of necessity or of mercy. Paul, in Col. 2:16, intimates that the Christian, being under grace and not under the law, must conscientiously employ his own individual discretion in such matters of detail.

Reader. What objections are there to holding a Sunday School picnic on the Fourth of July, and what special reasons in favor of so doing?

There are no special reasons either way. If the date be convenient and the weather fine, it is probably as suitable as any other day, with the additional advantage that it has the element of patriotism, which ought to make the holiday more enjoyable if possible, besides affording an opportunity for inspiring exercises and addresses.

D. B. S., Myoma, Pa. What peculiarities belong to the number nine? We know that the digits of any number multiplied by nine when added together will be nine or a multiple of nine. What was meant in old arithmetics by casting out the nines?

Nine, five and three were the "mystical numbers"—the diapason, diapente and diatriton of the Greeks. Nine is the trinity of up, he will soon overcome his embarrassment. Many persons have become excellent speakers and very useful workers, who made a failure in their first efforts. When one is thoroughly in earnest, he is sure eventually to become, with practice, an effective speaker.

L. E. R., Brooklyn, N. Y. Who was the author of the motto that is so often quoted, "I shall pass through this world but once; any good therefore that I can do, or any kindness that I can show to any human being, let me do it now; let me not defer it or neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again?"

It is generally ascribed to Stephen Grellet, a member of the Society of Friends, who was of French extraction and visited this country early in the last century. It is not, however, certain whether he was the author of it or only quoted it from some earlier writer.

F. J. C., Sheridan, Mont. What is the meaning of the mammon of unrighteousness mentioned in Luke 16:9, which Christ said we were to make a friend?

It is evidently money; but it is not clear why Christ gave it that name unless it was that it was as the idol of unrighteous men, or as being acquired in so many instances by unrighteous methods. The words were used in connection with the parable of the unjust steward. That man schemed, when he found that his that their duties were not limited to business matters. The instructions of Paul to Timothy (I Timothy 3:8, 13) appears to indicate that deacons had spiritual duties. In many modern churches, the deacons are elected for secular duties exclusively, the care of the church building, the control of the funds, etc., but in the Protestant Episcopal Church, they are a subordinate grade of the clergy and usually pass, after a period of probation, to the higher office.

J. D. G., Gardiner, Me. Why is the phrase "a change of heart" used in reference to conversion? Should it not rather be "a change of mind?"

The change you suggest would not cover the meaning. It would imply a mental or intellectual transformation, whereas the affections, passions, desires, etc., need to be transformed, too. Christ spoke (Matt. 15:19) of the evil things which proceed from the heart, evil thoughts, murders, etc. David prayed (Psa. 51:10) that God would create in him a clean heart. This, of course, does not refer to the material organ, but to the impulses and proclivities which, by a figure of speech, we associate with the heart, that being the centre of life.

N. C. M., Mayfield, O. Why did Christ command his followers (Matt. 23:9), to call no man father? Why is the command disregarded?

He was not referring to the paternal relation, as the context shows, but in the sense of one who has authority in spiritual matters. He wished his followers to recognize no one's right to interpose between them and their heavenly Father. A clergyman has the right and it is his duty, to exhort, to warn, to instruct, to advise, but after all every man must look to God as the final authority, and realize that he is responsible to him alone.

Anxious, Scranton, Pa. Does the statement (Heb. 12:17) that Esau "found no place of repentance though he sought it carefully with tears," imply that repentance may prove unavailing in certain cases?

It implies that it may be unavailing to undo the past, to regain a privilege that has been renounced, but not that it is unavailing to gain pardon for sin. We are assured over and over again in the Bible, that the sincere penitent will be forgiven and taken back into God's favor. But that does not remove the consequences of wrongdoing. The drunkard may be forgiven, but he cannot recover his lost health if his indulgence has produced organic disease. The gambler may be forgiven, but that does not restore to him the property he has squandered. A wicked man who has caused the fall of another may be forgiven if he repents, but the one whose fall he caused, may go on in sin and may never be restored. These are cases in which there is no place of repentance in the sense of repentance undoing the past.

Reader, Five Islands. Is a lawyer justified in pleading in a case of murder, when he knows, without a shadow of doubt, that the man is guilty?

Guilt must be proved, and not merely inferred. Morally, a lawyer may not be justified in defending a guilty criminal, but legally, he is justified in securing even for such a one all the rights to which he is entitled, including a fair trial, a full presentation of his case and the demanding of proof on every charge as the trial proceeds.

F. G. M., Minn. There is no special law on the matter.

Wm. H. G., East Marion, N. Y. We see nothing wrong in such an arrangement provided it is all done in good taste.

WASHINGTON AND ROCHAMBEAU DURING THE WAR OF INDEPENDENCE

ACCORDING to the programme given in a previous issue of this paper, the statue of Comte de Rochambeau, the great Field-Marshal of France, who helped us gain our independence in the war of 1776, was unveiled May 24, in Washington, with imposing ceremonies, in the presence of distinguished representatives of our own and the French governments, and members of the Rochambeau and Lafayette families. It had been arranged that President Roosevelt and M. Cambon, the French Minister, would deliver addresses. Our illustration recalls in this connection the Field-Marshal's visit to our country when we had no President. When French and American armies marched and rode through Philadelphia (our then capital), on the way to Yorktown, it is related that Washington and Rochambeau "stood uncovered" when passing with their troops in review before Congress. The first plan for the Yorktown campaign was arranged in a meeting between Rochambeau and Washington at Wethersfield, Conn., May 22, 1781, Generals Knox, Duportail, and Chevalier de Chastellux being present. Thereafter the American General and the French Field-Marshal had many a conference in tent and on field, and they were together when Cornwallis' sword was delivered to Washington. Washington's congratulatory letter to the allied army, Oct. 20, 1781, "treats His Excellency, Comte de Rochambeau, to accept his most grateful acknowledgments for his counsel at all times;" he also presents two pieces of brass ordnance to the Comte's command "as a testimony of their gallantry."

trinities. According to Pythagoras, man is a full chord of eight notes, and the ninth is deity or the spiritual note which makes perfection. "Casting out the nines," probably refers to a custom in the "diamond jousts" of King Arthur, by which, according to the story, Arthur offered nine diamonds as the prize of nine jousts. Lancelot won them, and laid them before Queen Guinevere, who, in a fit of jealousy, flung them into the river. The story is told in Tennyson's Elaine.

I. D. Will the marriages of so many of our wealthy class with the nobility of foreign nations have a tendency to weaken our republican institutions?

Not necessarily. The lessons taught by some of these marriages would rather tend to confirm our love of republican institutions than otherwise.

L. C. H., Willard, Mo. Is it wise or needful that a person who is timid and easily embarrassed, speak or pray publicly? Is it not likely to provoke ridicule and do more harm than good?

If the person will forget himself, and turn his thoughts on the matters about which he is to speak, and the petitions he desires to put office was passing out of his hands, to impose an obligation on his lord's debtors, so that when poverty came upon him they would provide for him. This was dishonest; but Christ showed by his parable that money might be used honestly to a better purpose. If his followers were as much concerned about their future as this man was, they would use their money in the relief of distress, especially the distresses of their Christian brethren. Those who do so, will be richly rewarded in the future life, as he showed in his description of the judgment (Matt. 25:34-40.)

J. F. McB., Belmore, Fla. Have deacons in the modern church the same functions as they had in the apostolic age?

It is not clear what their duties were in the apostolic age. The assumption that the seven men whose election and appointment are described in Acts 6 were deacons is probable, but that name is not given to them in that passage. The duties of the seven were to look after the temporalities, the disbursement of charitable funds, etc., but it is clear from the story of Philip's preaching at Samaria

The Wonderful
Career of Bishop
William Taylor

HIS LIFE SPENT FOR THE HEATHEN

A Modern Paul, who Spread the Gospel
in Many Lands

FULL of years and honors, and with a glorious record of Christian work continued for over half a century in many different lands, William Taylor, the veteran missionary and lay Methodist missionary Bishop of Africa, passed away at his home in California, in the eighty-first year of his age. It would be difficult to find, in the whole range of pioneer Christian effort, a character that has more of the elements of true heroism, and of a "passion for souls," which counted all hardship and peril and self-sacrifice as nothing, for the Master's sake.

William Taylor was born May 2, 1821, at the base of North Mountain, Rockbridge county, Va. His father was a tanner, and until he was twenty-one years of age the future bishop spent his working hours in the tannery. The family were Presbyterians, but the father, having attended a camp-meeting at Cold Sulphur Springs in 1833, profited so much under the preaching of a Methodist minister that he resolved on joining the Methodist church. William was converted while a youth, and it became his highest ambition to preach the Gospel. He applied for, and received an exhorter's license from the Baltimore Conference, and was subsequently licensed as a preacher, and appointed missionary to San Francisco, Cal. He entered upon his duties in an apostolic spirit, and devoted himself without reservation to the service of the Master.

In 1862, he commenced his first foreign evangelizing tour. His destination was Australia. At the Ecumenical Council, a member inquired of the Wesleyan ministers from Australia regarding the success of the American and European evangelists who had visited that country, and without exception they stated that the permanent effects of the evangelistic labors of William Taylor in Australia were greater and more blessed than those of any other. From Australia he went to Africa, labored in Cape Colony, Natal, and Caffraria, where great additions were reported, both among foreigners and natives, twelve hundred colonists and seven thousand Kaffirs professing conversion. He went to India in 1870. He had no salary, but he set to work in faith, believing that God would feed him as long as he had need of him. He had written eight or nine books, which supplied him with funds for traveling. He preached throughout Southern India, opening preaching stations everywhere, and where churches already existed, doubling and trebling the number of worshippers. He left India in 1875, to assist Mr. Moody in England.

His India career was followed by missionary and evangelistic experiences in Palestine, Ceylon, Canada and South America, in all of which he showed the same intense devotion. His work everywhere was signally blessed in the conversion of souls. In May, 1844, at the M. E. Conference, he was present as a delegate, and when it was decided to elect a missionary bishop for the African field, Mr. Taylor was unanimously chosen. His career in Africa was in many respects the most extraordinary of his whole eventful life. He preached to the Kaffirs, the Hottentots, and many other tribes, through interpreters, and thousands were led to confess Christ. There he founded a charming mission in Liberia, on the Congo, in Angola, in Benguela, and in Zambesia, besides many in the South. These he manned with trained white workers, aided by native converts. Soon churches sprang up and the work flourished, being well supported by sympathetic contributors in America and Europe.

Experience taught Bishop Taylor that if the heathen races were to be won to Christ, the triumph must be achieved by first bringing the children to a knowledge of the Saviour. In all his mission work, child-training was a prominent feature, and the schools he established in connection with his mission stations in Africa are sowing seed for a rich harvest of souls in the coming years. In his long missionary career, he dealt with kings, civilized savages, and with potentates of every race, degree, and color. In addition to his new work, he labored among the old-established missions, and he fornia, in 1862, and returned in 1875, after doing evangelistic work in the Australian colonies, New Zealand, Tasmania, British Guiana, South America, India, and Ceylon.

The reminiscences of Bishop Taylor would in themselves fill a volume, and are replete with thrilling experiences. One of the many kings on the West Coast, who ruled over the Grebo tribe, was a potentate named Hodge. Through the Bishop's ministrations, Hodge was led to embrace Christianity, and soon many were brought into the Gospel fold. By royal mandate, the idols which the tribe had worshiped for generations, were broken, and the native shrines and fetiches destroyed. Chapel and meeting-house, Sunday School and day school, well-kept farms, and neatly-tilled gardens, with rows of clean, wholesome-looking cottages, took the place of the former dilapidated structures in Hodge's dominion. The progress of his people soon made the Grebos respected among the other tribes. The chief of an adjoining tribe—the Grewas—got into trouble with a neighboring chief, and war seemed imminent. Intelligence of the situation reached Hodge, and he sent an embassy to the chief of the Grewas (who were still in idolatry), informing him that he had learned of his trouble, and stipulating that if the Grewas would renounce their idols, and adopt the Christian faith, he would become their ally, and come to their aid. The chief accepted the terms, banished his idols, and clung to the new alliance. Since that time, the progress of the Gospel among the tribes in that section of Africa has been rapid.

Several years ago, on account of advancing age and infirmities, Bishop Taylor laid down his missionary charge in the African field, being succeeded by Bishop Hartzell. He spent the closing years of his busy and useful life with his family in California.

One of the most interesting features in his work in Africa was the adoption from heathenism of many children, who are now under Christian training. In one section there were eighty-nine boys and forty-three girls adopted. A native church in the district comprised a membership, including probationers, of 385. Cape Palmas Seminary has a school of over a hundred pupils.

Bishop Taylor paid a visit to King Leopold of Belgium, the ruler of the Congo State. He was very cordially welcomed by that monarch, who put a steamer at his service. In every way, the Congo State authorities, acting under the imperial command, facilitated the mission work. The success attending his consecrated labor was phenomenal. Where, a decade ago, the savage tribes sacrificed to their idols and where barbaric cruelty and cannibalism were rampant, cultivated farms, peaceful villages, and chapels sprang up, and the weapons of war were laid aside for the implements of peaceful husbandry. At every available point, mission stations were established, and these were constantly recruited by the arrival of new and devoted workers in the field. At Baraka, in Liberia, the king and chiefs of the tribes there drove out one of Bishop Taylor's missionaries and his wife. The Bishop sent word to the king that he would place a new missionary there. He sent a lady, who did successful work.

THE LIVING DEAD

TEXT - Ezek. 37: 3: "Can these bones live?"

A DARK, gruesome valley, peopled with the strangest of all strange hosts, a great army of bleached skeletons, is the scene of the prophet's vision. Amid the millions and billions of dry bones, there is not the gleam of one eye, the beating of one heart, the welcome of one hand-clasp. All are motionless. All are dead. Then, in the silence, there comes a voice asking the momentous question: "Can these bones live?" And, strange to say, as if in answer, the dry bones begin to move, the joints, like rusty hinges, creaking from long disuse. The different skeletons lift themselves and stand up. Then, stranger still, these skeleton forms stoop down, as we would bend to gather the fresh, clean linen after a morning bath, and they clothe themselves in garments of flesh and blood. God first asked Ezekiel whether the dry bones could live. Then God showed the prophet, by visual manifestation, that they could.

The same question which was asked the ancient prophet, I ask you, this National Memorial Day, in reference to the bones, the dry bones of the soldiers who died in our Civil War. I ask it in reference to the dead soldiers of the Northern and Southern armies alike. Now that the Civil War is forty years past, all are agreed that the men who wore the gray fought from motives just as honorable as those of the men who wore the blue. Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson were God's noblemen, as certainly as were U. S. Grant and William T. Sherman. Alexander H. Stephens was obeying the dictates of his own conscience as certainly as did Thaddeus Stephens. I ask this question the more boldly, because among the last plans of our martyred President, William McKinley, was one to do justice to the aged Confederate veterans. Can the bones of the Northern and Southern heroes, who suffered death upon American battlefields, live again? I ask the question, because I intend to answer it myself. I want to prove, this morning, that the men who met a soldier's death fighting bravely, are not dead. They are more alive to-day than when their deeds testified to the world that America's heroes and heroines—for I shall speak in reference to both—should be classed among the moral and intellectual forces of their day and generation.

Heroes Living by Example

The dead of our American battlefields are intensely alive to-day in their inspiring examples. Every true soldier knows what I mean by the overwhelming power of a personal example. It is the ability which a brave leader, by a deed of heroism, has to instil the courage of his own life into other lives. There comes a crisis in the battle. What does the assaulting brigade commander do? Does he keep his position in the rear of his troops, where he has a right to stay? Does he send one of his staff officers to lead in the charge? Does he look after his own safety? Oh, no. He draws his sword and steps to the front of his brigade. He hurriedly utters a few inspiring words. He says: "Boys, the safety of the whole army depends upon this move. Either we must capture yonder hill and break that opposing line, or else the whole force must retreat or surrender. Some of us may lay down our lives there. Will you follow me, men? I ask no man to go where I am not ready to lead. I ask no man to charge where it may not be possible for him to step over my dead body. Men, will you go: will you go?" And all down the line of throats there comes the hoarse answer, "Ay, General, we will go! We will go!" This was the way General George Edward Pickett did, when he stepped in front of his soldiers at the battle of Gettysburg, and led his brigade across those bloody fields, until at last his lines were almost annihilated. With tears streaming down his cheeks, Pickett returned to report to his commander, saying: "General Lee, my noble brigade has been swept away!" This was the way Marshal Ney did, when he led the Old Guard down into the ravine of Ohain, where the Waterloo tragedy was practically ended. This was the way Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick, did, upon the battlefield of Barnet. When the great king-maker saw that his troops were being routed, he rode to the top of a hill and dismounted. There, with sight of his men, he drove his sword into the heart of his noble war charger. Then, having cut off all possibility of personal escape, he called his troops, saying, "The Commander of the English forces is here to conquer or die! Will his men be willing to die with him?" The retreating soldiers gathered around their noble leader and died by thousands, as the Earl of Warwick himself died. War may be hell, as an American General once bluntly declared; but by the gleam of the hot, hissing, demoniac flames of that awful inferno, are seen the heroic deeds of many, whose noble lives have been tried and purified by the fires of an earthly martyrdom.

This National Memorial Day, we are living among the glorified scenes of the past. We are ready to suffer for the old flag, because its red folds have been dipped in pools of human blood. We are better fathers and husbands, and sons, because the domestic hearth of many a family has been builded out of the tombstones of Arlington Heights and Petersburg, of Nashville and Atlanta. We are better men and women, because our dead soldiers have shown us how to nobly live and how to gloriously die.

Heroic Self-Sacrifice

The dead of our American battlefields are intensely alive to-day in the influence of the sorrowing loved ones who were left bereft. Sometimes, we are apt to erroneously believe that the only sufferings of war were to be found in the gunshot wounds and the swamp fevers, in the heartrending cries of "Water! Water!" heard at night from the wounded, lying between the contending lines; in the colds, the heats, the hunger, the weariness and the homesickness suffered by the men at the front. But I have always believed that the wives and mothers, and the sisters and sweethearts, who stayed at home to weep, suffered far more than the husbands, and sons and brothers, who donned their uniforms and went forth to die. Think of their sad, weary nights. Think of their startled ears when the rumors were heard that a great battle was about to be fought. Think of their wet eyes, scanning the long newspaper columns of the dead and missing. That awful word "missing!" Think of the poverty which the young widow had to face, with four or five children at her back. To-day, we honor the dead soldiers who wore the blue and the gray. We ought also honor the wives and mothers, the sweethearts and the sisters, who were willing to give those soldiers as a sacrifice, as well as the heroes who were willing to die.

To show what the women at home had to suffer, I want to read what is perhaps the saddest letter ever penned by mortal hand. It was written by Abraham Lincoln, to a humble woman who lived in Massachusetts. Many such letters could have been written to other women, North and South, who were called upon to suffer in the same way, and perhaps to make equally great sacrifices:

"DEAR MADAM:—I have been shown in the files of the War Department, a statement of the Adjutant-General of Massachusetts, that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously upon the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any words of mine which should attempt to beguile you from a loss so overwhelming, but I cannot refrain from tendering to you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement, and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and the lost, the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

"Yours very sincerely and respectfully,

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

But though the noble women of the North and South may have suffered greatly, yet by their very sufferings, God was able to heal the wounds, the bleeding wounds, of this nation. The breaking hearts of the North reached out toward the breaking hearts of the South, and they found that in their troubles

They Were Sisters

Some of the bereft mothers had sons fighting in both armies. As such a mother sat in her family plot between the two graves—between the grave of her boy in blue and that of her boy in gray—she prayed that the past civil strife might be forever buried. She pleaded with earnest prayer, because her boys who died had come from the same cradle and had looked up into the eyes of the same mother. When Bunker monument was being dedicated, the crowd was so great that by the pressing and pushing, a panic was threatened. The presiding officer tried in vain to still the tumult. Then the orator of the day arose, and Daniel Webster's deep voice called out, "Stand back!" Some of the people cried, "It is impossible to stand back." Then Webster's flashing eye swept over the multitude, as he answered, "Don't use that word impossible in a place like this. Nothing is impossible at Bunker Hill." Some pessimists said, that the bitterness of the Civil War would never end. But as Daniel Webster said in reference to Bunker Hill, so nothing was impossible in the suffering presence of broken-hearted American womanhood. Their common griefs and sorrows forever forbade men to revive the horrors of our civil strife.

The dead of our American battlefields are intensely alive to-day, because they have proved that the strength of this country is to be found in the multitudes of its consecrated homes, and not in the size of its standing armies. When the Civil War broke out, there were not enrolled upon the muster of the war department more than twenty-five thousand men. The traveler could go up and down the length and the breadth of the land, without seeing an American soldier in uniform, except in a few forts built for protection against the Indians, and in places like Governor's Island and Fort Sumter. All Europe was shaking under the tramp of the martial hosts which were marshaled upon every frontier; yet in America, there were not enough soldiers to make a respectable-looking national awkward squad. But no sooner did the bugle blast of war sound, than the volunteers came from everywhere. They came from the pine woods of Maine and the Louisiana plantations, from among the California flowers and the Alabama cotton fields, from the Dakota prairies and the Mississippi flat-boats, from the Pennsylvania mines and the South Carolina tobacco factories. They came by the tens of thousands. They came by the hundreds of thousands. They came by the million. They came to prove for all time, that for this country at least, there is no need of a great standing army.

A National Lesson

When war breaks out, a nation has to use the ships which it has constructed in times of peace. It takes years to build a floating fighting machine. But what I have said is true in reference to a standing army. This country which, in a few months, could produce well-disciplined armies, as the army of the South and the army of the North, does not need, save in times of war, to call the keenest brains, the strongest arms and the brawnniest bodies from the avocations of peace, and have the nation groaning under the weight of useless taxation. It does not need to have fewer merchants, mechanics and farmers, in order to have more privates and lieutenants and captains and majors and colonels and generals. If we have the right kind of homes, there will be officers and privates ready to protect the country from a foreign foe whenever they are needed.

And what kind of fighting men did these volunteers make? The very best the world has ever seen! When the American Civil War opened, the European monarchies looked upon it as a war of mobs. These foreign nations supposed it to be a disorganized mass. But when the Civil War was over, and Count von Moltke, the great German strategist—the General who brought to a successful issue the Austro-Prussian war of 1866, and the Franco-German war of 1871, studied the campaign in the South, he said, "The American war was not a collection of struggling pigmies. It was a war of giants!"

An American never fights as well as when he is a civilian, taken out of the ordinary walks of life to fight for the defense of his own home and native land. Where in all the pages of history can you find greater deeds of heroism than those exhibited in the Southern army? The reason I use this as an illustration, is because the Southern army, being the defeated army, had to suffer more. That army fought until they could fight no more. The Confederate soldiers fought until they had no shoes upon their feet. They fought when they had no food in their stomachs. They fought until their clothes were in tatters, and the Southern ladies had to tear up their dresses to bandage up their wounds. They fought until the slightest wound, on account of their depleted physical systems, would cause death by gangrene. They fought until they died.

Where can you find a greater example of heroism than that exhibited by the Colonel of a Pennsylvania regiment? As he was leading in a charge, he looked down and saw the upturned face of his own boy. All that he did was to kneel a moment, and kiss his child, saying, "Good-bye, my darling, good-bye." Then he turned and waved his sword, crying, "Come on, boys! Come on! Charge and follow me!" Where can you find a greater deed of heroism than that exhibited upon the field of battle, when the ambulance corps found among the wounded, a boy in blue, with both of his eyes shot out. There he sat, holding in his arms the dead body of another boy in blue.

They Were Brothers

As the surgeon's aids came near, they heard the blind boy whispering to the dead boy, "Poor Bobby, poor Bobby! Mamma told me to look after you, and I will. Poor Bobby, poor Bobby!" Ah, in this land of the free and the brave, we do not want a greater standing army. We do need, however, more consecrated homes. We do need more fathers and mothers who will build the right kind of family altars. We do need the right kind of Christian churches, where those children can be brought in contact with God. We need those Christian boys and girls started in the right kind of avocations. Then when war comes, if it must come, the Christian homes of the North, the South, the East, the West, will yield up their sons for the battle and their daughters for the field hospitals.

A REVIVAL IN CECIL RHODES' LAND

☞ ☞ ☞ God Answering Prayer With a Pentecostal Shower of Blessing in South Africa ☞ ☞ ☞

FROM the Rev. R. Wodehouse, a missionary correspondent, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received an interesting report of Gospel progress in Rhodesia, South Africa. Dr. Wodehouse writes:

"UMTALI, RHODESIA, S. E. AFRICA, March 25th. "I have good news to report to you. God is already answering the prayers of his children, who are praying for us. We are having quite a revival. What a thrilling sight a few Sundays back to see the rude penitent form thronged with heathen seeking salvation. The place was a very Bochim for weeping. The Holy Ghost fell on the people during the preaching of the Word, carrying conviction to their hearts, and in agony many were crying for mercy.

"I interrogated each one to see if they had a clear conception of what they were seeking. One man said, 'I am sitting by the wayside and want to find the right way.' Another, 'It is very dark, I want light.' Another (putting his hand on his heart) said, 'My heart is sore, I want instruction.' It was blessed to see the heavenly radiance on their dark, upturned faces after they had fully surrendered.

"I have handed the evangelist a class-book with the names of thirty probationers for instruction and a course of catechizing previous to baptism.

"We had our first native baptism a week last Sunday—the infant child of our evangelist. It was a most impressive service, God's Spirit was present; the child was named 'Samuel Hartzell.'

"I am training a boy fifteen years old to be a teacher and preacher. He was one that came forward to the 'penitent form' and accepted Christ; now he is drinking in instruction daily. I give him an hour each day and work to do at home. He says God has called him to be a preacher. It is most interesting to see the way he drinks in the exposition of the life of Christ. It is a wonderful story to him. I want the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to pray for Willie. He sings splendidly and has a beautiful voice.

"I expect to open a new mission station in a few days at Zimunya's Krall, about seventeen miles from here, and another at Mtambarra's Krall, about fifty miles due south. We are cramped and cannot do much as funds are low. I thank your readers, who have thus far helped us in this great work. 'The harvest truly is great and the laborers are few, pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth more laborers into his harvest.' We are looking out for an evangelist for Beira, and shall be glad to have help from friends of missions.

R. WODEHOUSE." Accompanying Mr. Wodehouse's letter is a photograph, which we publish on this page. In it our readers can readily recognize our old friend Bishop Hartzell, Methodist Missionary Bishop of Africa, and the Rev. Erwin H. Richards, founder of the Mtambarra mission and a grand pioneer for Christ in Southeast Africa.

The Rev. Erwin H. Richards, of the Inhambane Mission (whose portrait appears in the photographic group published on this page), writes to this journal under a recent date:

"Our paper, the Inhambane Voice, has been suppressed by the government and farther issues forbidden. I hope to be home soon and see if we cannot get modest issues printed in America, without offending our Romanist rulers. Meantime I appeal to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to do us the favor to print an item now and then about our mission work.

"The Mission Society has allowed us the same grant as for the four years past, which was sufficient barely for that time. But a live mission will not remain stationary; it must expand. Three years ago, Tizore began with five pupils, which were all he could get at that time. Then they came to him without his seeking them. Now he has to refuse to take any more, because he has nothing with which to feed them. We have only an empty treasury with which to greet their coming, and they come helpless, hungry and naked. We need at once sixty bags of coarse salt, which costs here eighty cents a bag. We need twelve boxes of soap, which costs here $4 a box. Will not some reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD volunteer to 'salt' us for one year, and some other to provide soap?

"Our children have nothing but corn meal porridge and peanut gravy the whole year round, and it does not seem right to refuse them salt; yet we have no funds for anything but the essential. Then our people must be clad. A naked and dirty Christian is unthinkable. It costs us $500 a year to clothe the 160 children now in our schools, or not far from $5 per pupil. It costs not far from $5 more per year to feed them; their only food which is common corn. In our boarding school, where we supply other foods and better clothing, with salt and soap, it costs about $20 per pupil for the year. Our teachers also cost $4 per month for each station. Perhaps there are individuals, or groups of people who are willing to help in this work. There is no satisfaction more perfect than in caring for those lost people. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will forward to us any gifts God's people may contribute toward our work here.

The Christian dead of our American battlefields are intensely alive to-day in the heavenly recognitions which have been given to them. Impossible is it to suppose that God would allow his servants who were to be found in both armies and who died upon the American battlefields, to go unrewarded. In the beautiful sermon upon the Mount, Christ pronounced a blessing on those whose lives were full of tears and heartaches, poverty and persecution, slander and death. Do not Christ's words apply to those brave men? Did they not suffer enough? Were not their wounds deep enough? Did not they hunger enough and have homesickness enough? Did not many a fair-cheeked boy, under his blanket at night, sob himself to sleep, or, unable to sleep, keep on crying, "Oh, mother, mother; if I could only see mother!" In one of the National museums, I saw a Bible which had saved a soldier's life. When the young man left home, his mother gave it to him. In battle, he was carrying it in his coat pocket, just over the heart. A flying bullet almost cut its way through that Bible, but it was stopped at one of the leaves of the four Gospels. Did not many a dying soldier have one of these Bibles in his hand? Did he not weep over it, when he was dying, far away from home? Can God forget his Christian soldiers who died upon the American battlefields? No, no! The Bible describes the entrance into heaven of a mighty host marching through the gates as before the reviewing stand of an earthly ruler. St. John, in Apocalyptic vision cried out in rapture as he saw them: "Who are these who are arrayed in white robes and whence came they?" There must have been many seen by his prophetic eye who came from our American battlefields to whom the answer that he received would apply: "These are they which came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

When the English soldiers came back from the Crimean War, all London turned out to greet them. After they had marched past the reviewing stand, Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort arose to receive those heroes who were to be decorated with medals. As each soldier approached, the Queen, with her own hand, pinned the medal upon the breast of the man she wished to honor. Some of those soldiers had an empty sleeve. Some came on crutches. Some had their heads bandaged. At last there came a litter. In it was carried the physical wreck of a man. Both of his legs had been shot away. One of his arms was gone. His body had simply been riddled with bullets. Then the Queen, with tears in her eyes, bade the bearers halt. She left her place and descended the steps of her stand to the side of the litter. She bent over the poor veteran. On account of his sufferings, the Queen wished to honor him more than any of the rest. So the more the Christian dead of our American battlefields suffered, the more Christ has honored them. Therefore, the more are they alive to-day in the heavenly reunions.

My fellow countrymen from the North, the East, and the South, and the West, this Memorial Day, let us go forth to decorate with flowers the graves of the American soldiers who died upon the field of battle, because their glorious memories still live in our hearts. Let us decorate all the graves alike. Let us put just as large a wreath upon the grave of the unknown picket who was shot by the sharpshooter in the moonlight when doing sentinel duty, as upon the grave of the most noted general of the war, Albert Sydney Johnston, who fell at Shiloh, Leonidas Polk, who fell at Pine Mountain, Georgia, John Fulton Reynolds, shot at Gettysburg, James Birdseye McPherson, killed at Atlanta, or George Armstrong Custer, who was scalped by the Indians a short time after the close of the Civil War, receiving the same meed of honor and the same floral tribute at the hands of their countrymen, as the humble color-bearer who, when the regiment was retreating, rallied the men just before he was struck by a bullet, and leaped up into the air, crying "Oh, my God, I'm gone!" and fell dead. Give a hero's garland to the farmer boy who kissed his mother for the last time under the shadow of the apple tree when he went forth to die. "Greater love hath no man than this that a man lay down his life for his friends." Every one of the dead heroes paid the greatest of all sacrifices for his country. And as we, one and all, fellow countrymen, from the North, the East, the South and the West, kneel down to place the Decoration Day flowers upon the graves of the boys in blue, and of the boys in gray, may we swear before God by the altars of our dead, that we will oppose with inflexible determination any one who will ever again try to stir up sectional strife. The Civil War is dead. By the blood of our loved ones we swear it. The Civil War is dead! By the Northern regiments which followed Fitzhugh Lee and "Joe" Wheeler, and the Southern regiments that followed Lawton and Merritt in the Spanish-American War, when North and South fought side by side, we know it.

Then, as we kneel, on Decoration Day, by the altars of the dead soldiers who fell upon our American battlefields, may we consecrate anew our lives to our country's service. May we realize that when we serve our Lord and Master best, then we serve best our nation. May the sorrow and the sadness, the sufferings and the deaths we this day commemorate instil in our hearts a profound love of peace, and a deeper consecration to him whose name is the Prince of Peace. Let us labor to disseminate the teachings of Jesus that war in the future shall become an impossibility. Then shall be only Gospel peace. Then the American people will not only love the Lord their God with all their hearts, but they shall love their neighbors as themselves. Then the battles of the Civil War shall be remembered as the sad result of dissensions that are no longer settled by the sword, but are submitted to the arbitrament of the Prince of Peace. Then the glory of the Lord shall cover this land as the waters cover the sea. Then the red stripes of the American flag will not be the symbol of an earthly carnage, but of a Saviour's atonement,

Peace upon peace, like wave on wave,
This is the portion that we crave;
Peace like the river's gentle flow,
Peace like the morning's silent glow,
From day to day in love supplied,
An endless and unebbing tide.

Peace flowing on without decrease,
From him who is our joy and peace;
Peace through the night and through the day,
Peace through all the windings of our way,
In earthly toil which may not cease,
A deep and everlasting peace.

O! King of Peace, this peace bestow,
Upon our country here below;
Peace from the Father and the Son,
Peace from the Spirit all his own,
Peace that shall nevermore be lost,
Of Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

A PLEA For a Revival of RELIGION in the HOME

By JOHN WILLIS BAER

TRAVELING as I do from one end of the land to another, also in other countries than "my own, my native land," I am privileged to see into many different homes, and to touch the home life of many communities—and of people in all circumstances—some poor, some rich. Let me remain two days in a so-called Christian home, and I will have generous opportunity to judge of the depth of the spiritual life by its family prayers.

In the start, I want you to know how much I have been blessed at family altars, and how the spirit of a short season of prayer in the bosom of some family, in the early morning, has been a fragrant memory all the day long.

I do not think that any method that I have seen in one home can be universally recommended for all homes. In some homes, the father would gather the family together, and his would be the only voice heard in prayer or Bible reading. In another home, consecutive and topical Bible reading was the programme, and different members of the family would lead. In another, some sweet Psalm of David, or some blessed portion of Scripture had been memorized, and in concert the whole family would raise their voices in worship to the King of kings and Lord of lords.

Another home would find the children's Bible reading and the Lord's Prayer in unison a good way to begin the day; while in another I have sat with the family quietly, and with bowed head, communed silently with God, with no voice to break the intense stillness of the hour. In some homes the members would worship at the breakfast table before the meal, and in others, postpone "prayers" until the breakfast was over. In others, one member of the family would lead by the use of a piano or organ, in some familiar Gospel song or Psalm, that being followed by Bible reading and prayer.

Some homes invite the maid servants and man servants to have their place, and in others they are expected to have their part as well as their place. In one godly home in London, it was always a pleasant sight for me to see the five or six servants, male and female, file into the breakfast room, each with the Bible, and reverently be led by the sainted widow of the home. Some way or other, I always thought that in that home, employer and employee contributed his or her part, as Christ would have them, in making home the happiest place on earth.

My experiences, as I have intimated, have been varied. More than one time it has been in some little home of two rooms where only the real necessities of life were to be had; and at another time it has been in the home of the rich, and at one time in particular I was the guest of a multi-millionaire, and for several consecutive days received abiding strength at his "family altar." Hear me, the spirit has been much the same whether it has been a family altar in the humble cottage or in the modern mansion. Indeed, God is no respecter of persons, and will bless all those who call upon his holy name.

What I want you to understand, however, is that I believe some kind of family worship in the home is absolutely essential to the best life of the home. More than that, I believe that the busy whirl of every-day life has gripped and girls have not heard the voices of their parents raised to God in prayer and praise? Why?

My friend and associate, Mr. William Shaw, of Boston, has told me that while sitting in the writing-room of a hotel in the city of C —, he fell into conversation with a gentleman, who related the following interesting and touching experience:

"For many years I was a nominal Christian, but never took an active part in church work. We had one child, a sturdy boy about three years old. We had no family altar; but my wife, who was an earnest Christian woman, always had the little boy say his prayers before he went to bed.

"Frequently, after his prayer was finished, he would look up into his mother's face and say, 'Mamma, why doesn't papa pray?' She often told me about it, and urged me to have family prayers, but I was indifferent to her request.

"One Sunday evening, the preacher's sermon contained a message for me, and I went home from the service, and took down the old Bible, and said: 'Wife, we'll have family prayers tonight.' My little boy was all attention as I read the chapter, and as we knelt while I offered a brief and broken prayer. Then the little fellow climbed up into my lap, and put his arms around my neck, and said, as he kissed me, 'I's so glad papa prayed.'

"When his mother put him to bed that night, he kept repeating over and over, 'I's so glad papa prayed.' The next day I went to my work, and in the middle of the forenoon I was called home. While his mother was in the back part of the house, my little boy had climbed up on the open fire-grate to get something off the mantel. His little dress caught fire, and he ran screaming into the front yard. Before any one could get to him his clothes were all burned off, and he was unconscious and lived but a short time.

"As I looked at the little body from which the spirit had gone to the Saviour of the little ones, the sweetest comfort was the words of my little boy, 'I's so glad papa prayed.' I would not take all the wealth of the world in exchange for the memory of those last words of my boy, 'I's so glad papa prayed.' My life belongs to my Master now, and I am living in the sweet hope of seeing my boy some day in heaven."

O, fathers and mothers, how many children are going out of your homes never having heard the voice of prayer at the family altar?

Again I plead, for your sakes, to heed the call, and I plead for the sake of your boy and your girl. Bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh. Family religion is the foundation of our home life—let us lay the stone well deep, and in the fear of God.

May God bless this plea of mine for a revival of home religion—and to that end inspire many of my CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to put aside all excuses, and with grit and grace to take the first steps—if yours is a home without the family altar; begin at once—do it now.

THE HOUR OF FAMILY WORSHIP IN A HUMBLE HOME

some of the time that in the past was given by Christian parents to family prayers. I raise my voice to make a plea for a revival of the old-time religion in the home. Parents need it, servants need it, and children need it. I speak now more particularly to Christian parents. Am I not right? Ought we to begin the day without asking God for his blessing and his guidance? Ought we to dare to begin our work outside or inside the home without catching new inspiration from a portion of God's Word? Tell me, Christian parent, why so many boys

THE CHINESE FLOOD SUFFERERS

FROM United States Consul-General Goodnow, at Shanghai, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a letter dated March 16th, in which the writer says: "I hand you herewith a letter which will show you where the $1,000 Mexican of the $1,000 U. S. gold you sent has gone. The writer of the letter is the Rev. Don W. Nichols, of the Methodist Mission. . . I earnestly urge on you to continue the great good work you have been carrying on."

Mr. Nichols writes as follows:

NANCHANG, March 10.
I write in behalf of thousands that are actually starving in this section through the effects of last year's floods, to find out if any relief fund is available to help these suffering ones. The condition of hundreds and thousands of the farmers in this section is pitiable beyond description. They are actually living on grass. I have just passed through a section where many—yes, hundreds—have not had a mouthful of rice for over two months.

The worse feature is the inability of the farmers to plant their fields, for the lack of seed grain and the funds to secure seed. Hundreds of farms must go uncultivated this year if relief is not given. The dikes are down in many places, which means great suffering again during the spring and summer rise in the river.

My plan is, if funds can be secured, to personally oversee the rebuilding of the dikes and the distribution of seed among the farmers; by this means permanent relief can be given to the people. The hungry can be given employment repairing dikes, and thus earn their food. I should think it unwise to distribute rice or rice-tickets promiscuously.

The officials have promised me whatever guard I may need, to afford protection in distributing aid among the people.

If any aid can be had, and you will telegraph me what amount can be deposited with the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, at my disposal, I will begin work at once. I will render you a faithful report of how every dollar has been expended that passes through my hand.

Mr. Ernest H. Taylor (son of the distinguished missionary, Rev. Hudson Taylor, founder of the China Inland Mission), writes to Mr. F. H. Nichols, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's famine commissioner to China, as follows:

CHINA INLAND MISSION, 3d April, 1902.

DEAR MR. NICHOLS: We have received Tls. 1,500 from Tai-yuen Fu for Famine Relief, and are making out lists of those in distress. Elder Hsu Pu-uin went for me to see the Hsien Mandarin about the relief, and he expressed very grateful thanks. I am glad to say we have had good falls of snow and rain since I last wrote, which have very decidedly altered matters for the better. There is a prospect of a fair wheat harvest, and the price of flour has already lowered to two-thirds of what it was. The Mandarin has made a very small distribution of relief himself. He will issue proclamations with regard to our relief, and will give us all the help he is able.

The fall of rain greatly lessens the need for help, but the distress is very great, and we shall be able to make good use of any money that is sent, especially during the next two months before the wheat harvest is reaped. If you are able to send us more, we shall be able to make a wider distribution: with Tls. 1,500 we would only be able to distribute grain one time. Our method of taking the names, is for two or more trustworthy, capable men to go to a village, and call on the head men, and with them to call together the people to a public place. After preaching to them, the names will be taken and note made of all who smoke opium, of the number of people in the family, how many under twelve years of age and how many over, the former to be allowed for at half the rate of the latter. The official has given us the list of those he is helping. Again thanking you and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for enabling us to give this proof of Christian love to the Chinese. Believe me, yours sincerely in Christ,

ERNEST H. TAYLOR.

NORTHFIELD'S BIBLE STUDENTS

THE Northfield Bible Training School, the youngest of the "Moody Schools," completed its eleventh year, March 31. The study of the English Bible has been attended with manifest profit, under the leadership of the president, Rev. C. I. Scofield, with such able assistants as the principal, Miss Martha Hitchcock, Rev. N. Fay Smith, Prof. James McConaughy, and Miss Mary E. Silver Thorne. Three students from the year's enrollment work in Cuba; two go to orphanage work for colored children in Tennessee, four to work among the mountain whites; one is already serving acceptably as a pastor, and one hopes to go to the foreign field. Some will work during the summer vacation in needy rural districts, in city evangelization, or as pastor's assistants, returning in October for further study.

Though busy with Bible study, which is supplemented by courses in sewing, cooking, music and elocution, the students during regular term go out in "district work," to needy fields on the hills which bound the Northfield section of the beautiful Connecticut valley, where many problems of country work are met. Among the eighty-three students enrolled the past year, a sum was raised sufficient to build a small church in Africa, in Andrew Murray's district, to be called Northfield.

The Finest Naval Y. M. C. A. in the World

OUR sailors and marines are enjoying heartily their beautiful new "Home and Christian Club House," as the Y. M. C. A. Naval Branch, 167 Sands street, Brooklyn, was happily termed by many speakers at the dedication ceremonies, described in these columns last week. As our ships come in, crowds of bluejackets seek the establishment, availing themselves fully of its privileges. On the night of the opening, 195 slept there. In his address that morning, Mr. W. B. Millar had called attention to conditions on a previous night before present complete provisions had been made, when, after all available cots were filled, thirty-three men slept on chairs, and fifty had to be turned away. Some had cheerfully used newspapers for pillows, and all had been ready to suffer almost any inconvenience rather than run the risk of finding questionable shelter elsewhere. "Sailors appreciate what is done for them," said Mr. Tichenor, Secretary in charge of the Branch, at the meeting on opening night, and his "shipmates," as he called them, are making his words good. "It's your building," he added, "and we want a great many suggestions from you as to how to use it. We want you to help us run your Club House. One sailor has just advised a curio room, and we are going to arrange for it, so that when you bring here objects of interest collected in your cruises, there will be a proper place for their keeping and exhibition." Rear-Admirals Barker and Higginson, who are on the various committees directing the work, also urged the sailors to co-operate with the management by taking active interest in the institution, patronizing it themselves and bringing their shipmates with them. Admiral Higginson particularly commended the last course to them in the case of the apprentice-boys. "We have in the North Atlantic Squadron," he said, "a large number of pre-checkers and dominoes; parlor, restaurant, serving-room are all on this floor.

The second floor contains a small lecture hall for Gospel gatherings, committee meetings, etc.; a large and handsome auditorium, and private apartments for secretaries. On the third, fourth, fifth and sixth floors are the sleeping-rooms and dormitories; there are 201 of the former and four of the latter. In addition to sleeping-rooms and janitors' apartments, on the seventh floor, there is a complete camera department with a dark room, a modern laundry, where sailors may have

Rear-Admiral Barker is Chairman, and Rear-Admiral Merrill Miller Vice-Chairman of the General Naval Committee, which comprises a long list of rear admirals, commanders, captains, chaplains and other officers of the Navy. The Advisory Committee consists of Rear-Admirals Higginson, Matthews, Taylor and Captain Chadwick. Rear-Admiral Barker is on the Army and Navy Department Committee of the Y. M. C. A., of which Mr. William Sloan is Chairman and Mr. William B. Millar, at once Secretary, organizer and chief executive officer. Mr. Frederic B. Pratt (the official head of Pratt Institute) is Chairman of the Committee of Management of the Branch. Of the Women's Auxiliary, Mrs. E. A. McAlpin is President; Mrs. Russell Sage, Vice-President; Miss Helen Miller Gould, Second Vice-President; Miss Letitia Craig O'Neill, Secretary-Treasurer.

The Woman's Auxiliary, organized in 1897, owes much of its development to the Spanish War, during which the needs and sufferings of our "Boys in Blue," appealed forcibly to the sympathetic women of our land. Many feminine bands of mercy were formed. Prominent among these was the Woman's National War Relief Association, which cared for a great many sick and wounded soldiers, sheltering, as readers of this journal remember, a number at Mont-Lawn, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, which, having just closed its fresh air season, was placed at the disposition of the Association, of which Miss Gould was acting head. With the passing of the acute crisis and consequent disbandment of various relief bodies, the Auxiliary received some able recruits; and a unification of efforts results. The Auxiliary as organized now, could meet more effectively than any band of women in '98 any sudden stress that might arise. Co-operating with their brothers of the International Committee, as their washing done cheaply and quickly, and a pleasant, breezy roof-garden. In fact, everything to make the sailors' shore-life wholesome and happy is provided; and there is no need for him to seek meretricious pleasures elsewhere. From present indications Jack will choose the better part now that the better part is set before him. He will certainly lack no encouragement from his commanding officers, for the Government's approval was pronounced in no unice-boys—they are the life of the ship. Our apprentice-boys are wards of the nation, the hope of our Navy. You should seek to bring them under the best influences." The handsome seven-story gray stone structure covers the one hundred-foot square lot on which it stands, with the exception of a pretty bit of flower-garden, where seats and tables are scattered about. Besides the huge boilers and dynamos for supplying heat and electric lights throughout the building, the sub-basement affords space for various forms of masculine recreation. In the basement is a gymnasium, a swimming pool, and five hundred lockers, where enlisted men may store clothing while exercising, or where they may leave articles for safe-keeping during absence on cruises. Here, also, are a commodious kitchen connected by dumb-waiter with the restaurant above; a neat barber-shop, and other conveniences. The next floor is the busy centre of the building. Passing through the inviting vestibule, one enters directly into the beautiful reception hall, with its attractive staircase, marble drinking fountain, and vista of adjoining rooms. At the curved office-counter, men register and get their keys to sleeping rooms, and receive their mail. Here, too, they deposit such sums as they please, to be held in safe-keeping for them, placed at interest or expended as they direct. Reading-room, library, secretaries' offices; correspondence room (where everything tempts the sailor to write letters to home-folks), game-rooms, with chess, a recognized force in the Y. M. C. A. everywhere, it has a wide field of service and happy opportunity for bringing our sailors under the influence of their pure and noble sisterhood. Jack, in his life afloat, is removed from companionship of mother and wife, and it will be the best thing in the world for him, and those who love him, when a branch of the Woman's Auxiliary watches his interest at every port.

"A member of the Woman's Auxiliary presented to the International Committee a sum sufficient to purchase the land and erect the new building of the Brooklyn Branch of the Naval Y. M. C. A.," is the way the Souvenir Programme of the dedication states the fact, that Miss Gould gave the money—nearly a half million dollars—which established the Branch. Many persons have furnished rooms in the building, and the crews of several warships have done likewise. Receipts from charges made for board will be by no means sufficient to run the institution, and the International Committee earnestly hope that Miss Gould's example will prove contagious, and that some philanthropist will supply an endowment fund. Also, that means may be provided for the establishment of branches elsewhere. A house has been rented and fitted up for the use of the men at the Portsmouth Navy Yard, Virginia, and Captain and Mrs. McCalla have purchased a lot and are securing money for the erection of a building at Vallejo, Cal., near Mare Island Navy Yard. May the work prosper

False Security

NOWHERE does modern history contain the story of a populous city so swiftly and utterly annihilated as was St. Pierre by the volcanic fires of Pelee, when twenty-five thousand souls were swept into eternity in a moment, by a single blast of the earth's hidden furnaces. There have been greater disasters, yet none so suddenly overwhelming. But, though its fate overtook it like a lightning-stroke, St. Pierre was not unwarned. Never does the Almighty permit such calamities to descend upon the human race without warning. Nineveh, Babylon, the Cities of the Plain, and doubtless the Italian cities, had their eyes been open to read the signs of their times, might have foreseen the inevitable stroke that destroyed them, before it fell. But sin and worldliness dull the spiritual perception of communities, as well as of individuals, and the plainest tokens of impending danger and disaster are often unheeded.

In every great calamity that has overtaken mankind, there has been first a note of warning and an opportunity of escape. St. Pierre was admonished of its deadly peril long before the blow fell. In those volcanic mutterings and rumblings, God was speaking to the people of the tropical city. But the Governor and the "wise men" of the island, having looked at the smoking volcano, turned their eyes away, and, ignoring the ominous warning, lulled the people into a false security by declaring that there was "no danger." Afterward, they paid with their lives the penalty of their false counsel.

But there was one man in the doomed city—one amid twenty-five thousand—who interpreted the warnings rightly. He was Dr. Artieres, a physician who, with his family, lived in St. Pierre. He was not satisfied with the counsel of the Governor and his "wise men," and he urged the members of his household to proceed with him to Morne Rouge, whither he had already sent his wife and his two little children. They smiled at his forebodings and refused to go, so he went alone. Next morning, from the safe eminence of Morne Rouge, he and his wife witnessed the awful disaster that befel the city, whose population perished in the tornado of flame that was blown upon them from the volcano's mouth. As far as is known, not a human being who was in St. Pierre at 8 o'clock that morning escaped alive. The few survivors were on the ships out in the roadstead, but all in the city perished, from the incredulous Governor to the humblest laborer. Rich and poor, the aged and the children, all met a common fate.

To every soul that is unsaved there comes, at some period in its experience, a note of warning. It may be some dear friend who, dying, points that unsaved soul to Christ, the Rock of safety. It may be sickness, loss of fortune, or some other trying experience, which momentarily shows to that soul the spiritual path it should pursue. Unhappy indeed is the soul that neglects such admonitions. If the pleasures and cares of the world so blind us that we are deaf to the spiritual monitor, and reckless of that which pertains to our eternal welfare, we are in a condition like that of the wretched people of the Antilles, whose false security and infatuation led to their destruction.

To Spread the Name

THERE can be no real, deep possession of that great truth of the Gospel which we profess to be the foundation of our personal lives, unless we have felt the impulse to spread the name and to declare the sweetness of the Lord.

Did you ever, strolling through park or forest, stop under some leafy boughs and carve a beloved name on the smooth bark of the tree? You just followed the impulse of a loving heart. And that very same impulse makes it sweet to one who is in real touch and living fellowship with Jesus Christ to speak about him. There is a very sharp test for us. Are there not hundreds of professing Christians, decent, respectable sort of people, with a tepid, average amount of Christian faith in them, who never felt that overmastering—"I must let this thing out through my lips?"

It may be possible for a man to talk away his religion, and some of us, preachers especially, perhaps, may be in danger of making that possibility a reality. But for one Christian that loses his religion by speaking too much about it, there are twenty who endanger it by speaking too little. Shut it up, and it will be like some delicate creature of the air or woods put into a cellar fast locked and unventilated—when you open the door it will be dead. Shut it up, and when you come to take it out it will be like some volatile perfume that has been put into a vial and locked away in a drawer and forgotten; there will be nothing left but an empty bottle and a rotten cork.

Speak your faith if you want your faith strengthened; muzzle it, and you go a long way to kill it.

President Roosevelt in New York

CHRISTIAN people of all denominations throughout the country must have been gratified by the visit paid by the President of the United States to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church during its meeting in New York. The President does not belong to that Church, but like his predecessors, President McKinley and President Harrison, he has given personal testimony in the same building to the value of the aggressive work of modern Christianity. It is a significant fact, in these days of captious criticism and depreciation of personal religion, that the men chosen out of a nation of seventy million people to fill the highest office in their gift, should thus avow their faith in the Gospel. Not alone in our own land, but in every country in the world this fact will have its influence. Young men held back by fear of ridicule from confessing Christ before men, will feel that they are in good company, when they hear that the Chief Executive of the foremost nation on earth, not only avows his own Christian fellowship, but ascribes to the prevalence of religious faith, and to the efforts of Christian teachers, much of the progress that the nation has made in civilization and advancement. Statesmen, too, in the European Cabinets may learn a useful lesson from such an avowal. Religion usually plays but a small part in diplomacy, but European statesmen cannot fail to recognize the fact, that in dealing with the Washington Government they are dealing with men of conscience and Christian principle whose policy is in harmony with the teaching of Christ.

Giving Ourselves

IF you mean really to help, you must give not your money merely, nor your words merely, but yourself. The only way to do anything of genuine Christliness for the poor or for humanity in any of its wants and miseries is to give ourselves. We all recognize the value of this personal quality in everything we see and hear. We like a painting if it seems to bring us some inner soul message of the artist. It is the same in music. You hear some people sing, the technique of whose performance is perfect; they know all that the schools can give them; they have superiority of voice and artistic polish of tone, yet there is something lacking. They have not given themselves. When they sing they do not give you their hearts, their souls, their personalities; and because of that they do not and cannot move you in the profound depths of your being.

So it is in the sympathy and comfort and help which we offer to the poor and suffering. It is robbed of its sweetness, of its deep blessedness, if it goes without the self, the full heart and soul of the helper. A thousand well turned phrases of pious advice, and even the coins dropped from your purse, do not mean as much to the honorable poor and the broken-hearted, as one sob or one tear, one grip of the hand or one soft beam of the eye, that brings to the burdened one the conviction that you have given yourself.

Among the Workers

—IT IS GRATIFYING to learn that Dr. John G. Paton has been able to return to his work in the New Hebrides.

—A READER IN NEWARK, N. J., sends this interesting note of an evangelistic meeting:—"It was only a look, but oh such a look, that the evangelist cast on the young man who had just said in reply to his invitation to give up his soul to God, 'I don't believe in God and the Bible.' I could almost imagine the Saviour would have given him just such a look, it was so full of yearning and compassion that it seemed to me no one could resist. The man's whole soul shone out of his face and in one moment showed all his love for that poor soul."

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Provision for a Daisy

—DO NOT THINK that any work God gives you to do in the world is on too small a scale for you to do. The whole universe is not ashamed to take care of one little daisy. I say: "What are you doing down here in the grass, you poor little daisy? Are you not afraid nights? You will be neglected, you will die of thirst, you will not be fed. Poor little daisy!" "No," says a star, "I'll watch over it to-night." "No," says a cloud, "I'll give it drink." "No," says the sun, "I'll warm it in my bosom." Then I see the pulleys going, and the clouds are drawing water, and I say, "What are you doing there, O clouds?" And they reply, "We are giving drink to that daisy." Then the wind rises, and comes bending down the wheat, and sounding its psalm through the forest, and I cry, "Whither away on such swift wing, O wind?" And it replies, "We are going to cool the cheek of that daisy." And then I bow down and say, "Will God take care of the grass of the field?" And a flower at my foot responds, "Yes; he clothes the lilies of the field, and never yet has forgotten me, a poor little daisy." Oh! when I see the great heavens bending themselves to what seems insignificant ministrations, when I find out that God does not forget any blossom of the spring or any snowflake of the winter, I come to the conclusion that we can afford to attend to the minute things in life, and that what we do we ought to do well, since there is as much perfection in the construction of a spider's eye as in the conformation of flaming galaxies.

The Supreme Test

—YOU ARE to be rewarded, not according to the greatness of your work, but according to the holy industries with which you employed the talents you really possessed. The majority of the crowns of heaven will not be given to people with ten talents, for most of them were tempted only to serve themselves. The vast majority of the crowns of heaven will be given to people who had one talent, but gave it all to God. And remember that our life here is introductory to another. It is the vestibule to a palace, but who despises the door of the Madeline because there are grander glories within? Your life, if rightly lived, is the first bar of an eternal oratorio, and who despises the first note of Haydn's symphonies? And the life you live now is all the more worth living because it opens into a life that shall never end, and the last letter of the word "time" is the first letter of the word "eternity!"

The Value of a Child

—I AM GLAD THAT there are those who know something of the value of a child. Its possibilities are tremendous. What will those hands yet do? Where will those feet yet walk? Toward what destiny will that never-dying soul be taken itself? Shall those lips be the throne of blasphemy or benediction? Come, all ye survivors of the earth, bring link and chain, and measure if you can this possible possession. Come, all ye astronomers of the earth with your telescopes, and tell us if you can see the range of its eternal flight. Come, chronologists, and calculate the decades on decades, the centuries on centuries, the cycles on cycles, the eternities on eternities, of its lifetime. Oh, to save a child! Get the first twenty years of that boy or girl all right, and I guess you have got the manhood or womanhood all right and their entire earthly and eternal career all right.

Work for Each

—THERE IS FOR you, my hearer, a field to cultivate, a harvest to reap, a tear to wipe away, a soul to save. If you have worldly means, consecrate them to Christ. If you have eloquence, use it on the side that Paul and Wilberforce used theirs. If you have learning, put it all into the poor box of the world's suffering. But if you have none of these—neither wealth, nor eloquence, nor learning—you, at any rate, have a smile with which you can encourage the disheartened; a frown with which you may blast injustice; a voice with which you call the wanderer back to God. "Oh," you say, "that is a very sanctimonious view of life." It is not. It is the only bright view of life, and it is the only bright view of death.

Infinite Failures

A LIFE OF SIN, a life of pride, a life of indulgence, a life of worldliness, a life devoted to the world, the flesh, and the devil is a failure, a dead failure, an infinite failure. I care not how many presents you send to that cradle, or how many garlands you send to that grave, you need to put right under the name on the tombstone this inscription: "Better for the man if he had never been born."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The Coal Strike

LABOR troubles are matters for general regret. A strike nearly always involves suffering to the workman, loss to the employer and expense to the public. It will certainly involve all these in the case of the huge strike now inaugurated in the anthracite coal regions. According to a conservative estimate, one hundred and forty thousand men are now idle, and the number is likely to be increased. The demands of the workers are: A recognition of the Union; an advance of five per cent. in the contract price for mining coal; the hours of a working day to be reduced from ten to eight; the ton of coal to consist of 2,240 pounds; and the establishment of a minimum wage scale. There is a general impression that the first three of these demands were alone considered vital, and that if the operators had conceded them, or submitted them to arbitration, there would have been no strike. They have, however, assumed a determined attitude throughout the negotiations and would make no concession. They took the stand that the rate of wages and the general conduct of the operations were their own affair, in which they would brook no interference. Even Senator Hanna, who labored strenuously to adjust the dispute, was practically snubbed, and was unable to obtain any concession. The crucial question of the recognition of the Union, which means more to the men than any other, is met by the employers with the demand that the Union be incorporated, as a preliminary condition. They point out that until this is done they are at a disadvantage, because they would be dealing with a body which might repudiate an agreement without incurring any penalty, while the operators would be securely bound by their agreement. The demand for an advance of rate of wages is resisted, on the ground that the miners are already receiving high wages, but do not pay their helpers proportionately, and that it is really the complaints of the helpers which have precipitated the strike, the miners being unwilling to pay them out of their own pockets. The fact, however, remains that if the employers really had a reasonable case, it is a pity that they would not submit it to arbitration, instead of maintaining an arrogant attitude, which naturally irritates the workers. Meanwhile, there are signs of a resort to intimidation and violence, which if they are carried out, will alienate public sympathy from the workers. On both sides there is need of attention to the apostolic warning:

MINE WORKERS WAITING FOR STRIKE ORDERS

STRIKERS' DAUGHTERS

He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong that he hath done; and there is no respect of persons (Col. 3: 25).

A Mother's Self-sacrifice

A discouraged woman attempted suicide in New York a few days ago in a fit of uncontrollable depression. Her husband was taken ill about three months ago and was sent to a hospital. She obtained work, by which she was able to support herself and her two children. It was a hard struggle, for sometimes she was not well enough to work, and sometimes no work was to be had. She was in one of her worst straits when her husband returned from the hospital, better in health but not strong enough to go to work. The family was without food and the rent was past due. The woman fretted about the situation until her mind became affected. Her life had been insured for $500 when the family was prosperous, and the idea suddenly occurred to her disordered brain that if she were to die the insurance money would help her husband and children out of their trouble. She procured poison and took it, but happily her act was witnessed, and an antidote was given in time to save her life. The pathetic story was told on the Stock Exchange, and the brokers took up a collection for the woman. It realized seventy dollars, and a messenger was promptly sent to her with it. She was quite overcome when she understood that it was all her own. Bursting into tears, she exclaimed: "Now I know that there is a God in heaven." The poor creature was very sorry for the crime she had attempted, and took new heart for the renewal of her struggle. It is significant that her first thought on hearing of the act of compassion should have been a conviction of God's existence. How many sceptics might be brought to a similar conviction by some kindness or some loving act!

Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven (Matt. 5: 16).

Hereditary Taint

At the recent meeting of the New York Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Mrs. Annable called attention to the increase of the habit of immoderate drinking among women. She said that she recently accepted an invitation to a reception in honor of a newly-married pair. It was given at the house of the father of the bridegroom, who moves in the upper circles of society. During the evening, the bride became so intoxicated that she had to be removed from the room by the servants. A letter of apology was afterwards received by each guest. In the course of the same address Mrs. Annable quoted the case of a dissolute woman who died in 1827, when she was fifty-one years old. Her descendants have been traced, and have been found to number nearly eight hundred. Of these, upwards of seven hundred have been convicted of crime at least once; thirty-seven committed murder and were executed; and three hundred and forty-seven are habitual drunkards. It is estimated that the cost to the State of trying, maintaining in prison and executing members of this one family approaches two million dollars. The speaker logically pointed out that apart from the value of the soul, it would have paid financially to have expended money in effecting the reclamation of the ancestress of this dreadful progeny, in the early years of her life of sin.

Doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father? (Ezek. 18: 19).

Constructing his Coffin

In a village in the northern part of New York State lives an old gentleman who has made elaborate preparation for his obsequies. He is in excellent health and vigor, but has always had an inclination to do everything for himself, and, as far as possible, dispense with the services of other persons. Though he is not a carpenter, he is, as he says, "handy with tools," and had the fancy to make himself a coffin after his own taste. He selected the finest wood attainable, with which he has made an oblong outer case. Within, is another case so contrived as to leave a space between it and the outer case both at the bottom and the sides. A sling of cloth fixed on a wooden frame serves as a head-rest. The outside is stained black walnut, and the inside is painted a soft shade of drab. It is not lined with any kind of draping. Six bronze handles are fixed to the sides, and on the cover is a plate with his name and date of birth with a space for the date of death, which is the only detail to be added. He is in the habit, when visitors call, of climbing into the coffin and lying down to show how comfortable it is. We may hope that the old gentleman has not lost sight of the fact that comfort for his unconscious body is not the only thing he will need after his death. More important than that, will it be that his soul shall find rest in Christ.

Let us labor therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the example of unbelief (Heb. 4: 11).

PREACHING UNDER CANVAS

Preparations for Evangelistic Tent
Work in New York and Brooklyn

HOW valuable and successful is the work that is done in tents in our large cities has been abundantly demonstrated in recent years. Two classes of people are directly reached and helped by these services. These are the habitual church-goers whose business keeps them in the city during the summer, but whose churches are either closed altogether, or are open only for morning or evening services. The other class is composed of people who have unhappily conceived a prejudice for the church, but will attend a service held in a tent, where there is lively singing and preaching adapted to them. No one can have attended a tent service without being impressed by the fact that both classes are represented in the audience. It is a matter for thankfulness that in this way non-church-goers are reached. The experiment was opposed at the outset, but when it was found that the tent afforded an opportunity of preaching the Gospel to people who did not hear it in the churches, the duty became obvious, being in line with Christ's injunction to go into the highways and hedges with the invitation to come into his kingdom. The initiative for this season has now been taken in New York and Brooklyn, and two of its leaders give here the outline of the programme for their respective cities.

IN NEW YORK

BY REV. THOMAS DOUGLASS

Tent work in summer time has gone beyond the point of controversy as to its usefulness. The city of Cleveland, O., has tested it and endorses it. The same may be said of Philadelphia, Pa.; for year after year glowing reports come to us of the great good accomplished. It has been tested in our own city. Two years ago the work was conducted under the leadership of Rev. S. Hartwell Pratt, with the cooperation of such energetic business men as Mr. William H. Hall, and others; and not only did great crowds attend the services, but there were many conversions, many backsliders were reclaimed, and much spiritual impetus given to Christian workers. As a natural consequence the churches received additions to their membership and were quickened to do not only better work, but to begin earlier in the fall and winter than usual.

No tent work was done in New York City last summer. This was to be regretted. It has, however, stimulated the appetite of Christians to resume it in the coming summer. The desire is strong in many quarters.

It is a pleasure to state that a tent has been secured, and Fifty-sixth street and Broadway is the place where it is to be located. The dedicatory services were held in the week beginning May 25th. Eminent preachers

The help of Ministers, Sunday Schools, and young people's societies will be welcomed.

IN BROOKLYN

BY MR. E. D. BAILEY

The Brooklyn City Mission Society has arranged to erect two tents in Brooklyn for the summer. One will be located near the corner of Fifth street and Ninth avenue, near Prospect Park, and the other, at the corner of Saratoga avenue and McDonough street, about half way between Broadway and Fulton street. The tents will have a seating capacity of from five hundred to eight hundred persons. An effort is also being made to have a third tent of generous capacity in South Brooklyn, but the arrangements for this are not yet complete. The tents will be under the leadership of Messrs. E. D. Bailey, Fred Gardner, and T. C. R. Horsfield, Evangelists of the Society. The large increase in the population of the city renders aggressive Christian work a matter of duty. The success of the tent work last year gives reason to expect that this year's work will be far reaching in its influence. The tent near Prospect Park is to be fully equipped by the First Reformed Church, which furnishes the money to buy the tent and pay the running expenses. The church also expects to supply many valuable workers to aid in various ways. The Young People's Society will supply singers for the choir, ushers and personal workers. At the other tent a good corps of workers is already provided as a part of the fruit of last year's tent work and the winter's work at Sunshine Mission. Volunteer singers, speakers, and personal workers will be abundant. It is a part of the plan to have first class speaking and singing at the tents, and also to make the testimonies a feature of the work.

Besides the tent work, the City Mission Society has arranged to have open air services at some eight or ten different points in the city. These services will be in English, Swedish, and Italian, and will be in charge of the regular missionaries and evangelists of the Society. The Society has six regular preaching stations for Italians and two for Swedes and the open air services in the foreign languages will be held in the vicinity of these stations. Every effort is being made to carry on the most active summer campaign which Brooklyn has ever had.

of different evangelical denominations have already promised their help. Rev. Mr. Pratt will be the leader. He will have as his advisory committee Messrs. W. A. Tucker, T. B. Freese, W. L. Cannon, Jr., W. M. Beekman, H. D. Blakeslee (Treasurer), B. S. Dunn, S. H. Berry (Assistant Treasurer), E. M. Bliss and Alex. C. Eadie. These gentlemen represent respectively the Presbyterian, Methodist Episcopal, Reformed, Congregational and Baptist denominations. The preaching, however, will be Evangelical and not denominational, with Christ and Him crucified as the dominating theme.

A SERVICE IN A GOSPEL TENT OF THE BROOKLYN CITY MISSION

TO sum up the order of events in general, they are as follows: the rise of false Christs, national disturbances, persecutions from Jews, the destruction of Jerusalem, the escape of Christians from death when it falls, the dispersion of Israel and the desolation of Jerusalem, the long continued dispersion, interference in earthly affairs by the hand of God in famines and earthquakes, national hatred, betrayal of brethren, false teachers, apostasy, the waning love of Christians, the world-wide evangelism, the abomination of desolation, the period of unequalled tribulation shortened for the elect's sake, the rise of false Christs, the period of striking signs, to be closed by "the sign of the Son of Man in heaven," the "Coming of the Son of Man in power and great glory," and the gathering of the elect unto him. This order seems to bring together the various portions of the dissected map, making one complete and harmonious picture. Where fragments are carefully put together, and thing fits into thing, without a flaw, there is a strong presumption that all of the fragments have been recovered, and that they have been properly arranged according to the original design. We shall assume, therefore, that this is the correct order unless some overwhelming evidence to the contrary is adduced.

Another important thing is to see the end or objects kept before the mind of the Lord in the whole discourse as recorded in Matthew. They seem to be principally twofold: first, to guard against expecting the end of the age, and the personal coming and kingdom, as possible, before the destruction of Jerusalem and before the evangelization of the world. Second, to give such instruction as would insure the safety, guide the minds, and keep alert and watchful the hearts of his disciples. He is presenting the sign of when the Jews will say, "Blessed is he that cometh," of his coming, and of the end of the age, in such a way that the apostles could not, might not, and did not, expect these things within their lifetime, or at a wrong epoch. His first words are: "Take heed that no man deceive you." This is most important, as many rationalists have boldly declared, in these last days of apostasy and blasphemy, that our Lord taught his disciples to expect his return at any moment, that the apostles expected to see him back in their lifetime, and that Paul acknowledged that he had been deceived when he corrected his errors toward the close of his life. It is strange that such assertions should be made in the face of what is recorded in these three Evangelists.

See how our Lord guards against undue haste in expecting the end, or his return, "Take heed that ye be not led astray." The time is at hand when many will come and say, "I am he." "Go not after them." "Ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars, but the end is not yet." "Nation shall rise against nation," and famines shall come, but these things are not "the sign" of the coming and end. "Ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake," and this, of course, makes the dispersion of the disciples amongst all men a necessity. Many professed believers will betray one another under great suffering, false prophets shall arise, iniquity shall be multiplied, the love of the majority will wax cold, but the end is not yet. The imminent thing is, the predicted hatred and killing. They were to lose their lives for the sake of Christ and of his Gospel. Finally, he says, "This Gospel shall be preached in the whole inhabited earth for a witness, and then shall the end come," and the Lord shall come with it. Here we see caution heaped upon caution, to guard the apostles from hastily concluding that their rejected Lord would return before the appointed time, at the end of the age.

Further on, in this discourse, is the parable of the talents, inserted to enforce the duty of working and watching, and the same thing is seen. The man going away into a far country "cometh and maketh reckoning with" his servants only after a time of full opportunity has elapsed. We cannot evade the force of this by saying that "long time" is indefinite. A child can understand that it does not mean a "short time," much less any imminent moment. In the face of what had been previously said, warning his disciples against being deceived about his speedy return, and also about the evil servant who took advantage of his knowledge that his Lord would certainly "delay" his coming, giving himself up to cruelty toward the servants beneath him within, and to carousing with profane people without, no ingenuity can evade the conclusion that it was intended to indicate a long and extended period, during which our Lord should be absent from the earth.

VOLCANIC ERUPTIONS CONTINUE

Pelee and La Soufriere Still Emitting Showers of Rocks, Lava and Dust — The West Indian Calamity Growing

THERE is no immediate prospect of a cessation of the volcanic disturbances in the West Indies. It was hoped that, with the frightful outburst of May 8 and 9, Pelee and the Soufriere, the two volcanoes on Martinique and St. Vincent, had expended their energies and would gradually subside; but the hope was doomed to disappointment. Both volcanoes had alternate periods of diminished and increasing violence for many days after the first eruptions, but on May 20, Pelee, which seemed to have been accumulating fresh force for several days, burst forth with a fury greater even than that which first overwhelmed the city of St. Pierre. Streams of boiling lava and showers of fiery rocks and of mud, covered anew the ruined city, and enveloped also the greater part of the suburb of Carbet, which had escaped with slight damage from the first eruption. "A jet of fire destroyed Carbet," was the report made to the authorities. Basse Pointe, which had been hurriedly deserted, was completely covered up by lava. The noise of the explosions in the volcano could be heard twenty miles off and the trembling of the earth was felt much farther. The coast was swept by a mighty tidal wave.

In the port of Fort de France, fourteen miles from the volcano, the howers of hot rocks and dust, together with the detonations of the volcanic explosions, which shook the place, caused a general panic. It was believed that the city was about to meet the fate of St. Pierre. People fled from their houses, thousands going to the seashore, where they vainly sought to get aboard some of the vessels, but nearly all the shipping in port had left the roadstead for the open sea at the first alarm. When the multitudes, wild with terror, fled to the hills. During the panic at Fort de France, the U. S. consul to Guadeloupe, Mr. Ayme, and a party of Americans, including several correspondents, were in the imperiled city. They were taken by launch to the American cruiser Incinnati, which lay out in the bay. The Potomac, the French cruiser Uchot and the British warship Indefatigable were also in the bay, and took off in small boats as many people as they could accommodate. Most of the natives returned to shore when the eruption subsided.

Whatever hopes were entertained of restoring and re-occupying the now doubly buried city of St. Pierre, must now be abandoned. Even the villages in the vicinity are in ruins, and will henceforth be deserted. Relief work at Fort de France is progressing satisfactorily. Famine, all the authorities declare, is now out of the question. It is probable, however, that the relief may have to be continued for many weeks. A large part of the island is covered so deeply with the volcanic

Sunday night, May 18, La Soufriere ejected with tremendous violence great quantities of rocks and ashes. Lava flowed in smoking streams down the mountain sides. At a point within six miles of Kingstown, the ground was covered with two feet of ashes and rocks. From many points fugitives flocked to Kingstown. New craters are said to have opened on other peaks nearer to the capital. A great part of the island is being rapidly covered with the lava flow, and every growing thing is obliterated. Hundreds of additional deaths are reported, including several at mission stations.

A general collapse of both islands is feared. It is known that there are new outlets of volcanic energy at considerable distances from the larger craters, and the dread is growing that the rocky bases of Martinique and St. Vincent may both be so honeycombed by subterranean forces, that a subsidence of the entire land areas of these islands may yet happen. At Fort de Kingstown, and its condition has created a panic there. Kingstown advices say that the latest great eruption of La Soufriere took place on Sunday evening while worshippers were returning from church. A great luminous cloud, apparently thirty miles high, drifted across the island, discharging lightning incessantly. The volcanic craters rumbled and the people were frenzied with terror. There is now a general desire to leave the island and a great exodus is inevitable, unless the disturbances quickly cease.

In the year 1812, the Soufriere terrified the people of St. Vincent by an eruption which covered a large part of the island with volcanic dust. About fifty persons perished at that time. Mont Pelee, in Martinique, has had two notable eruptions before the present one, the first in 1760, when great damage was done to St. Pierre and to the cultivation of the surrounding country, and the second in 1851, when hundreds of lives were lost. The height of Pelee is about 4,000 feet, and that of La Soufriere 3,520 feet.

Mr. Edwin Ives, a well-known business man of New York, who has traveled extensively in the West Indies, describes the Windward Islands and their people as peculiarly interesting and instructive. He says: "Martinique is specially picturesque. In the background behind St. Pierre, are the two great mountains, Pelee and Montrose, with an abundant variety of tropical vegetation growing everywhere. One is struck by the generosity of the people who live on the mountains, in giving flowers to strangers. The island is famous among the West Indies for beauty and luxuriance of vegetation. Its bold mountains show evidences of careful cultivation far up the sides. In St. Pierre, the streets were paved with Belgian blocks, and through every street a steady stream of clearest water flowed down to the sea. The natives speak only the French language, although here and there one speaks English. The beautiful Josephine, the Creole Empress Consort of Napoleon I., was born on the island of Martinique, and there, amid its quiet scenes, she budded into womanhood.

"Martinique is situated at the intersection of two lines of volcanic energy, one running through the island from northeast to southwest, and the other from southeast to northwest. It has been concluded scientifically that this point of intersection is very dangerous. This, for example, is true of the famous volcano, Cotopaxi, which is situated at the intersection of two lines of volcanic energy, and is the most notable of the South American volcanoes.

"The morals of St. Pierre seemed very lax. After sundown, when the shops were closed, the women—very beautiful and gay in the rainbow colors of their

France the fear of a collapse is general, and the people are anxious to get away from the island altogether; but Guadeloupe, Dominica, and even distant Barbados are not free from the terror. Violent shocks have alarmed the people of these islands. In a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Barbados, W. I., Mrs. S. Antoinette Esterbrooks, a well-known missionary, writes:

"We do not feel sure that we are on terra firma, but we do know that underneath us are the everlasting arms. Since Monday the volcanoes of South America and the West Indies have been in eruption and yesterday Barbados began to tremble from centre to circumference. The reports began to grow louder and more frequent, and then darkness came and the ashes began to fall as thickly as a furious snowstorm at home. During the night they fell to the depth of nearly an inch. The volcanic eruptions sounded like an Amerimost that all vegetation is temporarily dead. Over a large section, the general formation of the island has undergone a marked change, the aspect of highlands and lowlands being in many places unrecognizable. Many of the refugees from the villages are being taken to St. Lucia. All are being supplied with food.

On the British island of St. Vincent the situation is most a repetition of that on Martinique, although, fortunately, the loss of life has been much smaller. On can fleet cannonading the island. The darkness was so dense you could only feel. The gaslights went out: the island rocked; the houses rattled, and at intervals the sky was illuminated with the awful flashes and paths of lightning. Thunders rolled above us. I could only pray, and this I did for the many, many sufferers, and those who were unprepared to meet God and yet must go. Yesterday was the second time within a year that we have had volcanic notices that little Barbados is not as quiet as she seems.

Mount Enham, one of the old volcanic hills on St. Vincent island, whose fires were supposed to be extinct, is showing signs of activity. It is only six miles from apparel—seemed to control the streets and were very bold indeed."

Governor L'Huerre, of Martinique, has cabled to Paris advising the deportation of all the inhabitants of the ill-fated island, in the event of the volcanic disturbances extending, but the proposition has been disapproved by the government. M. L'Huerre says the people are convinced that "God is angry with the island, and means to scourge it and sink it in the ocean."

BLESSINGS IN THWARTED PLANS, PAUL CROSSES TO EUROPE...

ACTS 16: 6-15

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- ACTS 22: 15:
"THOU SHALT BE HIS WITNESS UNTO ALL MEN"

TWO great truths this lesson proclaims: one is that the European races, Christianized by missionaries in Paul's day, are "debtors" to the world to do likewise for all other heathen; the other, that God often thwarts our plans, as he did Paul's twice in this lesson, to do more for us and by us in his own better way.

The Lesson Story

The ship must have a rudder, the horse must have bit and bridle, and these must be in guiding hands. And people also need to be guided, not in the body so much as in the spirit. "Where God leads I will follow" is the very best motto we can take for our lives. Let us see how it worked in the life of Paul. He had returned from his first missionary journey, and we find him resting at Antioch, in Syria. But his soul burned with desire to go again. He proposed first to visit the places where he had been, including the island of Cyprus, Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe, and then to pass on to places where he had not yet preached. He proposed that he and Barnabas should go together as before.

God's Plan Often Differs From Ours

But God had a different plan for Paul. It was God's plan to have Paul and Barnabas go in two directions, that they might preach to more people than if both should go together. They had two opinions about taking the young man Mark with them, but had it been best in God's sight for them to go together again, their difference about Mark could easily have been adjusted. And so, under God's guidance, Paul started alone by land, to be joined later by the wise Silas, who had been sent on the errand of peace from Jerusalem, as we learned in our lesson last Sunday. And, later still, Paul took to his company his "own son in the faith," young Timothy, and later still, Luke, the beloved physician. Barnabas started with Mark by sea to the island of Cyprus, and so there were two streams of missionary effort instead of one. The visitation of places where Paul had already been was a part of God's great plan, in order that those who had become Christians might be strengthened in the faith in Jesus. That part of Paul's plan coincided with God's plan, just as we have seen two roads run along side by side. But not so with another part of Paul's plan. As at the beginning there was a difference between what Paul proposed to do, and what God intended he should do. Paul thought he would go into a little corner of Asia called Bithynia. It was colonized by Romans, and was a rich province. But God proposed to open up the great continent of Europe to the preaching of the Gospel, and so Paul was hindered by the hand of God from going into Bithynia. How was he hindered? In a vision of the night, a man of European dress and face, not to be confused with an Asiatic, stood before Paul, and cried, "Come over into Macedonia, and help us." Europe had stretched out her hands for the Gospel. "Where he leads I will follow" was Paul's motto, and straightway he set his face towards Europe, then a land of idol-worshippers.

Paul's first convert in Europe was a woman named Lydia. There is a beautiful story of how Paul and his company found Lydia. They landed at Philippi on the day before the Sabbath. And the next morning, knowing that they were men of destiny who had come to accomplish a great work for the Lord, they started out early to find their opportunity. They were anxious to begin to carry out God's purposes. They learned that there were Jews in Philippi, and that, having no synagogues, it was their custom to meet by the river side for prayer. Paul and his company went there and found a meeting for prayer, but only women were gathered. This fact did not turn them aside and make them seek a place where they might find men, but Paul preached the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the women, and one woman in that company became a Christian, a follower of the Lord Jesus. Her name was Lydia—not a woman of distinction, but a business woman, who, on week days, sold dyed stuffs of the choicest quality, royal purple. Lydia not only accepted Christ, but brought her whole household, and all were baptized in His Name. That was the first Christian family in Europe. The grace of Christian hospitality at once appeared, for Lydia not only invited but urged, "constrained" Paul and his company to be her guests while they should remain in Philippi. She would not take "No" for an answer. And in doing so she received yet greater blessing, for she gained further knowledge of Christ in the daily conversations of Paul, as he sat at her fireside and her table.

Illustration and Application

They assayed to go into Bithynia; but the Spirit suffered them not (v. 7). Here in two verses we are told how the preaching tours Paul planned were divinely headed off right and left, and he was hedged into a path that led straight to then heathen Europe. The "Asia" he started to preach in was not the great continent of that name, but a small fraction of Asia Minor. Divinely forbidden to go there, he turned his face toward Bithynia, only to find God again, like the angel of Balaam, blocking his path. God had a far greater work for him, namely, to Christianize Europe, to which he was divinely led through thwarted plans. "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord." "Commit thy way unto the Lord, and he shall direct thy paths." A Christian banker said to a group of young people, "You are wont to talk of luck and chance, but I do not believe in either." "Tell us why." "I will gladly, and it shall be an incident out of my own life. There was a great snow-storm that, for twenty years, I regarded as the unluckiest accident of my life, but I regard it so no longer. I was then a young man starting in business as a clerk in a firm of cotton brokers. The storm had broken down the telegraph wires about our own town, and I was told to take a despatch to the nearest city, and send it from there. I started in a sleigh, but before I was half way I found the drifts impassable, and was forced to turn back. The result was that the firm lost one-third of its capital, and I was thrown out of employment. But while I was struggling back through those drifts I heard a cry for help, and found in the snow by the roadside a mother and child nearly frozen. I managed to get them to the nearest house, where the mother died, but that boy grew up, full of energy and courage. He pressed his way through school and college, became a specialist in medicine, and has made discoveries that have benefited the civilized world. When I consider this rescue, to which I was turned aside by the drifts that thwarted my plans, and when I remember that the losses to me and to the firm were but temporary embarrassments, while the gain in such a life saved is world-wide and eternal, I can ever thank God for the blessings in that thwarted plan. Who can chronicle the great victories in defeats, the great successes in failure? The roll of faith's victories, in Hebrews eleventh, includes not only those who, like Daniel, "stopped the mouths of lions," but those also who, like Paul, "were slain with the sword." The Cross itself is the supreme instance of victorious defeat.

Come over into Macedonia and help us (v. 9). Then it was the European idolater cried to the Asiatic Christian for help.

Europe as a Mission Field Now it is the Asiatics whose sins and consequent sorrows cry out to us to carry them the blessings that Christianity has to bestow for both worlds. Of course, Europe did not really "want" the Gospel, nor does Asia to-day, but Europe needed it—that was what the vision meant—and so to-day we are to give men in mission lands what they need, remembering that "the lack of wants for the higher goods" is always a deeper poverty than "the lack of goods for the higher wants." Nothing in the way of physical lack can be so sad to the really thoughtful man as mental and spiritual lack. Every idolatrous land has always lacked what we mean by that distinctively Christian word, HOME. In every heathen land, for example in classic Rome of the past and cultured China of the present, the murder of infants has been common. "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." Christianity has "turned the hearts of the fathers to their children, and the hearts of children to their fathers." In this lesson, of all others, we should tell over as ancestral heathen beads, to arouse our gratitude for deliverance, the names of the days of the week that record the god worshiped by our heathen ancestors on each recurring day: the sun on Sunday, the moon on Monday or Monday, Tuiske on Tuiske's day or Tuesday, Woden on Wodens-day or Wednesday, Thor on Thor's day or Thursday, Freats on Freats' day or Friday, and Saturn on Saturn's day or Saturday. No wonder the Friends wish to give up such relics of heathenism, although we may utilize them to arouse gratitude for deliverance, and to rebuke those who, themselves, the beneficiaries of Christian civilization, refuse to give it to others. No wonder Presbyterians object to the use of Sunday, which means the day for Sun worship, and prefer Lord's Day, the Bible name of the day of weekly rest and worship. Every argument against missions is answered by nineteen Christian centuries in Europe. The power that could develop the humane progress that Europe has witnessed since the days when Rome found her delight in the wholesale slaughter of beasts, gladiators and martyrs. "Slaughtered to make a Roman holiday, and when our ancestral Norsemen drank themselves drunk out of the skulls of their foes, can change the most savage races of today into gentlemen, after the fashion of Christ.

A certain woman named Lydia heard us. The first audience in Europe to hear a Christian sermon was a company of devout women who had no church, but gathered by the river on the Jewish Sabbath for worship. And these, a business woman, a merchant, name Lydia, and her household, were the first European church members. With Paul and his company as guests, they set up the first Christian family altar in Europe. Thus began the Christianizing of Europe. And she not as great results come out of the small beginnings that modern apostles are making in Asia and Africa and Oceanica to-day?

Europe's First Christian Home

The apostle of the New Hebrides, I John G. Paton, writes us in the very words we send this lesson to the press, thanking us with joyful gratitude "for securing the law that removes the American rum sellers from his mission field, to which, these lines are printed, he will have returned to undertake new work, at almost four score years, on a cannibal island where there was not even one Christian household when he landed. Not content to have had the most noxious weeds removed from his field, he contributes ten dollars from his purse to help carry the world treaty that shall protect also the fields of other missionaries.

Dr. John G. Paton's New Work It is a good time to tell again the story of the well Dr. Paton dug on Aniwa, when he was just beginning his work in the New Hebrides. The people were almost dying of drouth, but the friendly chief was alarmed when Dr. Paton proposed to dig into the ground for fresh water. He said: "Your head is going wrong. Rain comes only from above." The natives all thought him mad but consented to dig when offered fish-hooks in payment. When twelve feet had been dug the sides fell in, and the chief again remonstrated. They thought if he reached water would be the sea, and he would fall into mouths of sharks. But Dr. Paton persisted, in spite of difficulties, until he could send up from the well bottom jug of fresh water. The old chief felt of this "Jehovah-rain," as they called it, to see if it was really water, poured some out to see if it would run, and at last tasted it. When he was fully persuaded, and his people, that it was water they brought their idols to be broken and buried. If we have never seen it before, what a miracle water would seem to all, in its manifold sources and uses! When the Orient would invite some one to do a noble service, they say, "Dig a well."

He who establishes a church or other Christian institution digs a well for soul and body. As Jacob served Christ by digging a well, centuries before he came, where would pause in sacred thirst, so we serve Christ, and the "ones" he counts his representatives whenever to any country or city, or even in a home or heart, we bring the knowledge and the Spirit of Christ. Let us find some Aniwa where God would have us dig a well, or, at least, give a cup of water in His Name.

Paul's undertaking, to carry the Gospel from Asia to Europe, reminds us of that greatest tunnel in the world, being cut through the Alps, to make an easy passage from Switzerland into Italy, which formerly could be reached only by difficult and dangerous mountain passes. As Sunny Italy was thus brought near to bleak Switzerland, so Paul not only brought Asia and Europe into Christian nearness, but brought earth and heaven. How many in the centuries since Paul's time have passed by that way to eternal life!

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"OBEY" IN THE MARRIAGE SERVICE

I WONDER how many brides have been playfully or sincerely reluctant to promise to obey as they plighted their troth before the altar. Occasionally a young woman is so much in earnest on the point that she stipulates beforehand that the minister shall omit the objectionable word, and substitute another in its place. On the other hand, there are brides who glory in flaunting their objection, so to speak, and who insist upon leading the most entire obedience to their husbands. "His will is law," the young wife says, fitting the sweetest of faces to the man, who thus far has not tasted the bliss of having any woman entirely subservient to his wishes. Certainly his mother and sisters have never shown such deference, nor, to tell the truth, has the sensible man expected it. As time passes, the wife who is readiest to pledge the most entire obedience, is like Regan and Goneril, in their diffuse professions to their father; the promises made to the ear are broken to the hope; the wife does very much as she pleases, which is exactly what the good husband wants her to do. And the woman who balked at the word "obey" is often so tractable in the double harness of marriage, that she really hastens to carry out every wish of her good man whether or not it is originally her own.

Obedience in wedded life cannot be literally insisted upon. One grown person of mature years and discretion cannot accord to another grown person the implicit submission which some parents exact from small children. The requirement is, however, of ancient and honorable lineage. When our first parents were driven from Eden, it was enacted that the wife should render service to the husband, as a sort of indemnification for the ill-turn she, in the person of Mother Eve, had done Father Adam, in persuading him to eat the fatal apple which "brought death into the world, and all our woe." "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee," is set down in the record in Genesis, and it has never been repealed. Milton's famous line, "He for God only, she for God in him," has been criticised in every age since the blind poet wrote it. And indeed were John Milton alive, and writing in the twentieth century, he would not express himself in just this way. But the ideal of home and family life from Eden down, in every land, in every clime, in every civilization, vests the supreme authority in the father, as head and priest of his household. A husband before he is a father, the head of the house has a right to the honor which the queen should pay the king. If a dispute on any important point arises, and the two cannot agree, the wife should yield. Ordinarily amicable households such irreconcilable differences do not arise. There is compromise. My wife wanted a red carpet, and I wanted a blue. We compromised on the blue," said a domestic tyrant. He and his following are rare. And a good man once, "My observation goes to show that the ruling force indoors is the wife's and the mother's influence, and that the biter of outside affairs is the husband and father." Marriage if made in heaven is comradeship, companionship, is true love and sweet observance and little kindnesses exchanged and daily bread of unselfishness, and charity that thinketh no evil. Live up to this ideal, brides of the summer, and no spectre of authority or dread of slavish obedience will dart into your path and shadow your joy.

Useless Explanations

Half the time we spend our breath in useless apologies, excuses and explanations. I heard this summer at a statement had been made concerning a friend's childhood, that it had been passed in deep poverty, whereas I knew it had been most comfortable, and I asked her why she did not correct the false impression. "Where would be the use?" she said. "People are not interested in matters quite outside their province. They will forget all about it to-morrow. Let it go. When principle is involved, explanations are superfluous."

I made a long and needless explanation of something the other day, myself. Before I finished, I observed that I had not the attention of my acquaintance, whose mind had veered off on another tack. I stopped short. Explanations are, when not absolutely demanded, the vainest and most pitiable of mistakes. LUCY EARL.

Labor-Saving Contrivances

Some of the new inventions on the market are so complicated that they do not really save labor. But many of them do simplify work very materially. In a well-equipped kitchen the housewife has tools with which to do her work. She chooses too among the various prepared foods which the grocers offer, some of which may so readily be cooked that they save her a good deal of time, and time saved is good economy for the house mistress.

Memorizing Scripture

In the daily Bible reading, many of us would derive much profit were we to memorize a text or a sentence, and carry it with us for help during the day. A simple verse laid away in store may be unspeakably precious when old age comes, or when some trial burns us in God's crucible.

Do Women Quarrel Among Themselves?

THE question was asked the other day by a cynic, not with reference to women under one roof, but with an outlook toward women in association. Women on asylum boards, women conducting orphanages and hospitals, women in clubs and organizations, the cynic claimed, could not get on without continual squabbles. Witness, he said, certain patriotic societies in this land. Are not their annual strifes matters of current history? Do they not delight the public and amuse the outsider by their retorts courteous and otherwise, and their keen repartee and bitter partisanship?

I am not disposed to agree with the cynic. A long experience on boards with women has led me to feel that my sisters are on the whole judicious, temperate and gentle of manner and speech. It is not an unheard of thing that men quarrel, that the quarrels are fierce and that wrath leads to unwisdom. Human nature is much the same thing wherever one finds it, irrespective of sex. Women when petty, are not so because of womanhood, but because of lack of self-control, or of the dominance of self-seeking, or of some other unworthy quality, which may be found in men as well as in women.

Meanwhile, women are learning more and more the value of forbearance in word and of self-effacement in purpose. It is wise for us always to put the work in hand in the foreground and to keep ourselves out of sight. She who cares for a cause, for the advancement of the Lord's kingdom in any department, cannot waste time on small personal ambitions which are vanity of vanities, nor does she. It is the good of the whole she is thinking of, and so thinking, she does not waste her breath in disputation.

Dressed for One's Work

Notice the ease with which a woman steps about her kitchen when she is properly dressed for her work, and compare her with the other woman, who is hampered with an ill-adjusted costume, meant for the parlor only. Corsets are right and comfortable in their place, but for domestic work, for sweeping, scrubbing, washing, cooking and bedmaking, a boneless waist is much better. The skirts should either be fastened to this by buttons, or so made that their weight hangs from the shoulder rather than the hips. A wash dress, a good-sized gingham apron, and comfortable shoes are essential to health as well as the convenience of the lady who does her housework neatly and thoroughly as a lady should. One cannot be in good health who is made wretched and nervous by the agony of aching feet. So, remembering this, the housewife should keep her feet in good order, and to this end, wear well-fitting shoes, which may cost a little more at first but are cheaper in the end.

The hair should always be arranged compactly by one who is busy in the kitchen, and a cap of some kind donned when sweeping or baking.

About the Children

Do not invariably take sides either with or against the children in differences which arise in the schoolroom. Teachers are fallible, and even principals may make mistakes. Give the children the benefit of the doubt, when their reports are more than ordinarily unflattering. On the other hand, be sure that your children are not perfect, and remember that they may be very trying to preceptors. Be fair, whatever else you are, fair all around.

Children's Dress

The main object of a child's every-day dress is to keep the child comfortable, neat, and free from solicitude. Whenever a little girl's frock is so elaborate that she must take more than ordinary care of it, her mother has made a mistake. The child is of more consequence than what she wears. I wish mothers who are in the habit of scolding their little daughters because of torn and soiled frocks, would put on simpler raiment, and let the children romp in freedom.

AN OLD-FASHIONED WOMAN.

Behar, the Neglected India Mission Field

...A DOOR OPENED BY FAMINE RELIEF FOR THE ENTRANCE OF THE GOSPEL INTO DARKEST INDIA

By
Miss Nora I. Churchman

O H, this poor dark land, Behar! No Sabbaths, no Bible, no house of God; no God but logs of wood, stones covered with black and red paint, or a monkey—"no Saviour but the Ganges, no worship but that of abominable idols and that connected with dances, songs, and unutterable impurities." I have traveled a great deal over India, but nowhere have I seen the density of darkness that abounds here.

MISS NORA I. CHURCHMAN

R. P. Wilder, National Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., in his Appeal for India, says: "I believe Behar is the most neglected part of India. Leaving Patna out of account, for all this large province, with its vast population of 24,000,000, we have only six European missionaries to the heathen. Quite half the province is as much heathen as any other part of the world, having never yet even heard the sound of the Gospel. The need of workers is tremendous, and the darkness is awful."

The picture is not overdrawn. For a distance of 111 miles along the railway, stretching away to the south and east, there is no missionary—a vast scope of country there for miles and miles purely heathen—thousands and thousands upon whose ears the Gospel has never fallen, worshipping Lakshmi, Siva, Krishna, Kali, all manner of gods and goddesses, trees, stones, cows, and every conceivable thing. Hundreds of villages—some along the railway, some out upon the plains, others nestling away back in the mountains—entirely neglected.

It was our privilege to be in Bombay at the time the good ship Quito lay in harbor with the American corn sent us by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for the famine sufferers. And still a greater privilege we had of distributing 400 sacks of it to the starving as they crowded round our doors. It soon spread over the country that the padre sahibs (missionaries) were giving out corn to the needy, and for miles and miles, from the mountains, from the jungles and everywhere, they made their way to our bungalow (house) for some of the good old corn. Some of them only lived to reach the village, others died in a little while after, but some were brought back from the grave (we might say), and embraced salvation. One old woman with two little waifs had wandered to our village in search of food. She was just nearing our house when some Mohammedans told her we would pour water on her head and feed her swine's flesh, thus break her caste and make her a Christian. This frightened her very much; but she was so anxious to save her children's lives that she thought she would run the risk. So she brought them, so emaciated that they were simply skin and bone, set them down on the veranda, and walked away, telling us we might have them. However, next day she stole around to see if we had killed them or what was going on. In a few days after, seeing our kind treatment of her children, she came to live with us, finally gave her heart to God, and is now in a Mission home one of the most active members, whom they would be loath to dispense with.

But there is a greater famine in India than that of 1900—a famine of the Word of God—greater, because more widespread, and Behar, is one of the worst-stricken districts. As we were looking for a bungalow in a village (a station we want to occupy), where there are no Europeans save the station-masters, we were accosted by one of the priests of a Hindu temple, who was performing a ceremony to the goddess Lakshmi. He begged for money to erect a shed over the goddess to shield her from the rains (mango showers), which were expected that month (February), and thus came the opening to tell him of the God who dwelt not in temples made with hands—who slumbered not, slept not, and whose ears were always open to those who call upon him. We left him gazing at us in amazement.

But since God's dealings with India the past few years, she is gradually losing faith in her idolatries and forms of worship. The old ship of Hinduism and Mohammedanism has sprung a leak. Now is the time to "send out the life lines across the dark waves."

On February 22d, was the Hindus great bathing day, and from all parts of India the people made pilgrimages to reach there on this holy day, to wash their sins away in "Mother Ganga," the Ganges River. How they swarmed into the bathing place, and everywhere they were re-feel so much better. I believe Jesus heard our prayers, and will answer." Sure enough, next morning he came in with quick, light, step, face all smiles, saying, "The baby is well; Jesus healed it, and I give him the honor. Our gods did not hear. I see your religion is the best." "But why do you not accept it then, Munshi?" "Oh, it would break the hearts of my children, and I must keep in the way of my fathers. It is my fate to be a Hindu, and yours to be a Christian." Everything is ascribed to fate in India. But before I sailed for America, our teacher was deeply interested in our Bible, and in inquiring the way of salvation.

The most heartrending things we meet in the work are amongst the women and girls. Wherever we go, we can hear the wails of the little girls, some crying because they are married and have to leave their mothers, others crying because of the beatings and cruel treatment their husbands and mothers-in-law give them. Then the dear little child-widows from five to twelve years old, sobbing, "Oh, why was I born a girl? What have I done that the gods are angry with me and took my husband?" Still another appeal, and that is from the zenana women, with their "shut-in" lives, the only time of their getting into the great "out-door world" being when they are taken to the home of their husband. If anyone in the world needs the Gospel, surely it is India's women, and they accept it more readily than the men, though we have strange experiences peating prayers and blessing the Ganges, at the same time paying homage to three huge idols, Jagannath, Krishna and Kali, which sat overlooking the bathing place. Thousands and thousands thronged the river banks, and the bathing done, hundreds of little white lambs, without spot or blemish, such as were required for sacrifice in Old Testament times, were taken to the temple and offered up. This, our munshi (Hindustani teacher), took part in, and from outward appearances one would not detect anything but the greatest confidence in his heart toward these gods. But in the evening he came walking hurriedly into our bungalow. I noticed that he looked anxious and nervous, and at once asked him what was the matter. "O Miss Sahib (Miss) my grandchild is very ill with the whooping cough. She is nearly choking to death. We have prayed to all the gods and they don't hear. I was reading in your Scriptures the other day with you of Jesus healing people in his day, and I want you to pray to him for my little grandchild. I believe he can heal her. I have confidence in your God."

At once I called Mrs. Moore (one of my co-workers) and the munshi knelt with us in prayer. As we prayed, he kept whispering a prayer and saying, "Amen." When we arose from our knees, his face was beaming with joy, and he said: "I with them, as they are so ignorant.

We are anxious to secure a building that would be suitable for a schoolhouse. The people are calling upon our little band for schools now, which will afford such an opening into the heart of Hinduism, for in these schools we can teach the children the Gospel—win their hearts, and then eventually win the hearts of the parents. Then adjoining the place which we want for a mission headquarters, is an old indigo factory, which is in every way just what is needed for an orphanage. Many orphans come, and others are brought to us in search of a home. These we contemplate taking in and training for evangelistic work among the people of this benighted district. The outlook through such a work is most hopeful.

How quickly this populous, benighted province could become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ, would the Church at large only supply the necessary funds. There are so many ways of pushing, lifting, helping and obtaining shares in heathen territory, even if we cannot go ourselves. I, in company with Mrs. N. V. Nading and other missionaries from India, expect to travel in the interests of the work through the United States this year, and shall be glad to hear from or see any friends at any time. A PEOPLE WITHOUT A GOD

R. GEORGE E. ANDREWS

RECENT-ly there walked into THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, a bronzed, weather-beaten, weary-looking man, in rough, hard-worn outfit, bearing a roll of skins and a double haversack of curios. He unfolded the roll, and spread out on the floor things of a hereafter, and no superstitions that take the place of these. I watched and questioned, for I had heard that there was no people but believed in some sort of God. There are no churches, no missions, no schools. In and around La Paz and other cities there are, of course, many Roman Catholic missions and schools. Spain was never able to do anything with these wild people of the interior. They have a language of their own; they keep to their old customs, their primitive ways, their huts of mud on pampas or mountain side; they raise their little patches of black maize and beans, and potatoes no bigger than marbles; and out of llama wool their women spin and weave on the crudest wheel and looms I ever saw, cloth for garments. The men hunt and fish and tend great herds of llamas and alpacas, sometimes 3,000 in number. Now, that the rubber industry has penetrated to most sections some are employed in tapping the rubber trees.

"They chew cacao leaves incessantly; I think if they had a God it would be cacao. They seem to me a race drunk on cacao. It does not hurt them, however, as liquor would. They are not quarrelsome, but a harmless, good-natured untidy folk. They can travel all day, carrying packs on their backs, and with little or no food to sustain them, the cacao supplying strength. Near the cities, where the white man corrupts them, they take to drink.

"When I speak of a Godless people, understand, I mean the inhabitants of the far interior. I traveled more than 600 miles inland, where there are no roads, nothing but trails,—trails sometimes on the brink of chasms so deep you could not see the bottom. My prospecting apparatus went on the backs of Indians; no mule is sure-footed enough for such paths. I shot the little animal which rare beauty. There were fleeces of gold, red and white and black, very silky and lustrous; and one great rug of many skins cunningly pieced together, a black llama brought in the centre of a golden ground, the work of Indian fingers. From the haversack he drew bits of pottery, miniature reproductions of domestic implements, fashioned and used by Bolivians. As shown in our picture, beginning from the left, they are: The furnace on which the cooking is done, pots and bowls being made to fit in the depression on top; pitcher; water bottle; pudding dish; cooking pot. In the lower row, which begins with two ears of black corn, raised on the sides, are a pot and pan for cooking, and lastly, a baby's bath-tub. Some lima beans are scattered about. Here are the chief equipments of an Andes kitchen and larder.

The weather-beaten man, Mr. George E. Andrews, of Sheridan, N. Y., had been traveling among the Indians of the Bolivian interior for many months, an American friend having sent him there to prospect for gold and tin. Returning to New York, he came to the Bible House almost as soon as he landed. "It makes me feel like home to see THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," he said. "We always took it in our house," and then he told of the strange, primitive people among whom his lot had been cast. "They are a people without a God," he said. "I slept and ate in their mud huts, and I never saw them worship anything. I never saw them bow down to any image of wood or stone, or pay adoration to sun, moon or stars. As far as I could discover they have no idea of a deity, no concepwore that golden fleece on a spur of the Andes, 20,000 feet above sea-level; it is a vicuna, a wild species of llama or alpaca, differing in many points from the domesticated animal, which serves the natives not only as wool-giver, but beast of burden and food-producer.

"There is certainly room for missions in that vast interior, where hundreds of thousands of people are without God. Educational work, instructing them in our language and our industrial arts would, if rightly conducted, appeal to them. They have no means of enlightenment now."

Our Children's Helpers

GENEROUS and pious friends of little children of the poor continue to remember the cause of the tenement wretches to whom the heated term now at hand must bring great suffering and much sickness, unless some relief is provided for them. Why Total Abstinence is Best*

Reasons why the Principle Should be Adopted by all, Especially by Christian People

BETTER proof of the efficacy of a remedy than that of experience we could not have. The principle of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks has been submitted to that test and abundantly vindicated. We have been told that intoxicants have curative and recuperative power, but a multitude of aged men can testify that they can get along well without them, and there are many physicians who cure their patients without resorting to them. These drinks are so dangerous; they have so remarkable a propensity to enslave those who use them; their effects when taken in excess are so ruinous to body and soul, that it is a relief to know that people can dispense with them without physical detriment. Experience has proved that neither for warmth nor vitality are they needed and both can be produced more effectively by other agents, which have none of the dangers that are inseparable from intoxicants. Even taken in moderation, they have a tendency to becloud the brain and to induce disease in the liver and other vital organs.

That total abstinence is best for the drunkard has been abundantly proved by experience. They have the curious characteristic of stimulating without satisfying the desire for them. The man who has succumbed to their enslaving power soon learns that moderation is for him impossible. The craving for them increases in power with every indulgence. One glass, so imperatively demands a second, and a second a third, that the craving which might have been controlled at the outset is irresistible at a later stage of a debauch. Like the tiger who has tasted blood, he must have more.

It is best, too, for the young man who has not been enslaved. Not only does total abstinence save him from the risk of becoming a drunkard, but it saves him from the temptation to other vices that are associated with it. The places where liquor is sold are too often places where gambling flourishes, and where lust holds carnival. Apart from the risk of contracting the habit of drunkenness, the young man is liable to be ensnared by the games of chance that he sees and to have his animal passions stimulated by the direct influence of the intoxicants he imbibes, and indirectly by the associations and surroundings of the places at which he obtains them.

Total abstinence is best for the poor man, because the drinking habit is expensive, and it is best for the business and professional man, because even the moderate use of intoxicants impairs the judgment and obscures the perceptive powers of the mind.

But it is from the spiritual standpoint that total abstinence is most clearly recognized as the best course. There is no vice so prevalent as drunkenness, no habit so injurious to society. It is the prolific parent of all kinds of crime. The majority of all the murders committed are done under the influence of drink. Manslaughter and arson and other crimes in large numbers can be traced to this kind of indulgence. Poverty, too, is one of its numerous progeny. It robs the widow and orphan not only of their natural protector, but of the funds with which they might be supported, if through any other cause they were bereaved. Lunacy, also, is directly traceable, according to the testimony of experts in mental disease, to the habit of drinking in numberless cases. As the habit is so injurious, and its victims so numerous, the Christian who indulges in it, even in moderation, practically adopts the attitude of Cain when he asked, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Every Christian man is responsible by the fact of his identification with Christ for the welfare of his brother. The apostle declares that although he saw no harm in eating meat, he would abstain from meat if meat was the cause of his brother stumbling. We cannot doubt what his course would be on that principle if he saw himself surrounded by the evil that we see around us. Intoxicants do cause our brother to stumble. The Christian, therefore, is bound by his Christian profession to set the example of abstinence, even if he be really benefited, as some men mistakenly affirm that they are, by the use of intoxicants. Concerned as he ought to be for the spiritual life of his fellows, none can doubt that total abstinence is best for him.

A Bowery Mission Concert

The first of a series of public concerts, under the auspices of the Bowery Mission, was given Friday evening, May 16, in the large hall of the Mission. Long before the hour an eager crowd of men stood waiting on the sidewalk. These concerts are a slight variation in the usual programme of the Mission's work, and have been specially arranged by Organist Benke, to give the men in the numerous Bowery hotels an opportunity of enjoying a varied and attractive musical treat. Superintendent Hallimond, in a brief address, bade the men welcome. The large audience, which filled the building to its utmost capacity, then rose, and sang the first and last stanzas of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee." The programme included the male chorus, "Praise to the Holy One," by the Mission Choir; soprano solo, "The Lord is My Light," by Miss Grace Hildebrand; baritone solo, "Ora pro Nobis," by Mr. Osteyee; male chorus, "God Bless My Boy," by the Mission male choir; soprano solo, "Whisper, and I Shall Hear," by Miss Hildebrand; violin solo, by Professor Boole, several superb selections on the organ by Professor Benke, and piano duets by Messrs. Hallimond and Benke, and other pieces. Each item of the programme was received with rapt attention by the great audience, who loudly applauded the performers. During the intermission, Superintendent Hallimond briefly described the Bowery Mission's work. The audience dispersed after singing the Doxology. The success of this first concert was, indeed, a favorable augury for the rest of the series, which will be held each Friday night during the summer.

OUR HOPE

THE vine which covers my window
Is tinged anew with green,
It has been barren all winter,
But now new life is seen.

And this is the lesson it teaches,
Which stills my heart's sharp pain,
Our God, of life is the giver.
The dead shall rise again.

THREE DAYS.

Then Postum Saved Him.

It makes rather solid friends of people when they discover a liquid food that will save life in extreme cases of need.

Speaking of Postum Food Coffee, a lady in Toledo, O., says, "For over five years now I have used Postum Coffee entirely in place of the ordinary coffee or tea.

I used to have stomach trouble and every time I drank a cup of ordinary coffee suffered the greatest distress. My troubles left when I left off coffee and began using Postum.

The most severe test I know of was when my husband was down with gastric typhoid fever. His stomach would retain nothing; we tried milk and various other drinks. Everything we put into his stomach would come up in less than three minutes. After the third day of this kind of work, I concluded to give him some Postum Coffee. He drank it and relished it and retained it, and for four weeks he lived on Postum and nothing else to speak of. You can depend upon it that Postum gained some good friends, for Husband would have died if it had not been for the nourishment afforded by Postum Coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

SUMMER COMFORT.

Get Ready for Warm Weather.

By a complete change in breakfast, at this time of the year, one can put the body right to go through the summer comfortably.

Leave off meat, potatoes and heavy body-eating foods, and use the food that will nourish the body and give reserve force to the brain and nervous system.

A most appetizing and healthful breakfast can be made on Grape-Nuts and cream, some fruit and perhaps two soft boiled eggs—this meal will furnish full strength and nourishment up to the next and has a remarkable effect on the body during hot weather. Remember the cells of the body you are now building will last you into summer, so be sure and build the kind that tend to keep a cool body and level head.

One pound of Grape-Nuts has more nourishment—that the system will absorb—than ten pounds of meat, without any of the internal heat of meat that a person wishes to avoid during the warm season; its rich, nutty flavor added to the delicate sweet of the grape-nut makes a dish pleasing to the most critical taste.

You receive Grape-Nuts from the grocery store to serve, as it has been thoroughly cooked at the factory by food experts, and it saves heat from cooking and time and exertion necessary in preparing ordinary food.

A change from the old breakfast to one like this will refresh and invigorate the system in a surprising manner and permit you to enjoy the pleasures of summer in a cool, comfortable fashion when your neighbors, differently fed, will be "hot."

Summary of Preceding Chapters

Erastus Winch, the owner of a small farm, finds in his barn early one winter morning the body of a beautiful woman. At her side is a new-born boy. Elizabeth Winch, his wife, pleads with him to adopt the child whom she names Immanuel, and after a stormy scene, in which Erastus insists on handing the child over to the poor house, she is allowed to have her way. She cares for him tenderly and loves him intensely. Winch, on the other hand, is cruel to him, and at the age of five years, in fear of a severe beating, the child runs away. Worn out with his long walk, he lies down to rest on the step of a house in which lives an eccentric old man named Moses Armitage, who takes the boy in and cares for him. Elizabeth Winch searches for him, and not finding him frets herself into a fit of sickness and dies. Mr. Armitage hearing of the death of his brother, a millionaire, whom he has not seen for many years, is informed that as his brother left no will, he is heir to his property, unless it should be found that a child was born to the deceased's daughter, whom her father had disinherited and had turned out of his house for making a marriage of which he did not approve. Moses Armitage, tracing the movements of his niece, discovers that she was the woman who died in Winch's barn. The boy whom he had sheltered, was consequently Immanuel Rossi, his own grand-nephew and the heir to an immense property. The deceased man's lawyers compensate Winch for supporting the child, and commit him to the guardianship of his uncle. Immanuel Rossi is carefully educated, and his uncle insists on his inheriting the property. Erastus Winch enters on his property, and proceeds to tear down the tenement houses in which his fortune was invested and build model homes in their place. While living quietly in the country among people who did not know of his wealth, he falls in love with Hilda Wilde, an ambitious girl, who has accidentally heard, through her friend Amelia Hurd, that he is a millionaire and marries her. He, supposing she has accepted him for love of himself only, takes her to live on the old farm without telling her of his wealth.

Chapter XXIX.—His Other Self

IMMANUEL ROSSI made no haste to acquaint his bride with what he was pleased to term the sordid circumstance of his wealth. What had money to do with these delicious hours, which could surely never be repeated whatever else of bliss the future undoubtedly held? And Hilda conducted herself with the most admirable self-restraint: her anxieties and doubts were as sweetly hid as ever her ignorance of classic lore had been in the earlier days of their acquaintance. Besides, what woman of twenty can be wholly insensible to the rapturous adoration of a handsome man in the first glow of his married happiness? It was very interesting to be adored, more interesting even than she had imagined. But—

This "but" spoiled even her pleasure in the ruffled muslin curtains, which this singular young husband of hers had not forgotten, and cast its shadow over every appointment of a really dainty nest of a home. To be sure, she laughed indulgently at certain masculine blunders, and wondered in private at certain masculine extravagances.

A ponderous chest of silver, bearing the cards of Messrs. Trent and Smalley with their respective wives, arrived at the beginning of the second week of their house-keeping. Hilda examined the shining rows upon rows of spoons and forks with a heightened color. "When shall we ever use all of these beautiful things, Immanuel?" she asked, looking up to meet her husband's watchful eyes.

"I am sure I don't know, little wife," he answered with a smile, "we might invite the haymakers in to dinner some day, and dazzle them with our magnificence."

"You don't mean that," said Hilda, with a toss of her pretty head. "But tell me, who are Mr. and Mrs. Trent and Mr. and Mrs. Smalley?"

"Trent and Smalley are my lawyers, dear."

"Lawyers?" repeated Hilda, with a rising inflection of astonishment.

"I have never told you, sweetheart, because it has really nothing to do with our happiness; but I had a tiresome lot of money left me long ago. Mr. Smalley and Mr. Trent look after it for me." He said this in the quietest, most matter-of-fact way in the world. Indeed, he could not easily have comprehended Hilda's mind had he been on a sudden gifted with the doubtful privilege of looking into its hidden depths.

There was nothing there after all but what the world at large would have called a very natural and laudable ambition; even that was not visible in the lovely eyes uplifted to his face, nor yet in the unwonted flutter of that perfectly modeled bosom. Her voice was calm and unshaken as she said slowly, "I do not understand—please tell me about it."

"Thank God you loved me for myself, dear," he murmured, kissing the white forehead. "You thought me a poor farmer. And that is truly what I am at present; but I shall be more—I can be more."

"But the money!" said Hilda, in a tone of sharp anxiety; "have you lost it?"

He looked at her with such surprise almost merging into pained doubt, that she called up a ghost of a smile. "You—you are so queer," she said, in a low, strained voice. "I—I wish—"

"What is it that you wish, dear?"

"I know so little about you," she complained, thrusting out her ripe lips like a child on the verge of sobs. "You have never told me the first thing about yourself. I do not even know you."

He threw back his head and burst into relieved laughter. "I am not much given to talking," he confessed. "Uncle Moses was silent as a hermit for the most part, and I early learned to hold my tongue; 'tis a habit hard to break. But you are right, dear, I have told you too little about myself."

"You were born near here—at the Four Corners, Aunt Emmeline says," observed Hilda, impatient at the reverie into which he seemed about to fall with his last words. "And you lived with the Winches—quite poor people; I have seen their house."

Immanuel's face saddened. "I do not think enough of those days," he said slowly. "Elizabeth Winch was a good woman—my mother—the only mother I ever knew. She died for me as truly as any martyr."

"How did they find out about you?" asked Hilda, hurriedly. "How did they find out that your mother was really—"

"Have you heard the story?" he asked.

"Very little of it," stammered Hilda, overcome with a curious embarrassment. "She—she died."

"She was killed—murdered," he said with deliberate emphasis.

"Oh, I never heard that!" cried Hilda, her eyes wide with horror. "Who did it?"

"My grandfather."

"Your grandfather? But she died in the Winches barn; there was an inquest. No one ever knew."

"It was all found out afterward," said Immanuel bitterly. "My mother was a petted, indulged child; she loved and married my father, who was a poor man. My grandfather thrust her out into the world, and she died; murdered by his pride, by his love of money. That accursed money came to me; the world calls me a rich man. But I am a child of poverty—a child of the tenements. I must atone!"

"I am so glad she wasn't really murdered," said Hilda, with a long sigh of relief. "That would have been too dreadful!" Her eyes were sparkling with suppressed delight; but her face was quite properly sober, drawn into mock doleful curves to match the sadness of that other face so near her own.

"You must understand me, dear," he said, a thrill of anxiety in his voice. "This money that has come to me is not my own."

"Not your own?" cried Hilda, aghast. "Whose is it then?"

"I hold it in trust for those to whom it belongs," said her husband. He leaned forward and took one of the little white hands into both his own. "I am so glad you loved me—here in this beautiful country," he went on softly. "It is only love that has made us husband and wife; it is only love that can keep us happy. That is why I never told you about the money. Do you not understand?" The anxiety had deepened almost to entreaty. He waited a moment, but Hilda sat silent with drooped eyes. "I cannot tell you all; you must see for yourself. You will understand—you will help me."

Hilda looked up. There was a steely glitter in the depths of her violet eyes. "I wish you would speak so that I can understand you," she said coldly. "I dare say I am very stupid, but I confess that it puzzles me when you tell me in one breath that you have had a great deal of money

A MISSION TO EUROPE

The Gospel Messengers Enter a Dark Continent

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

With Silas as a companion instead of Barnabas, Paul arrived at Lystra.

There he found one who had been prepared in God's workshop, and trained to be a missionary. His father was a Greek, and thus he could have sympathy with the Gentiles; his mother, who had taught him in the Scriptures (comp. II. Tim. 1:5; 3:14, 15), was a converted Jewess, and thus he united in his own person the two—Jew and Gentile—who, through the cross of Christ, had been "made one" (Eph. 2:9-22).

This trio, Paul, Silas, and Timothy, "went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia," the limit of Paul's former missionary journey. Where were they to open fresh ground? They had no plans of their own; but waited with open, listening hearts for counsel from on high. And light came. Paul would not go forward without this special guidance. Not Asia was made quite clear to them, the Holy Ghost forbidding them. Bithynia? No; "the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not." Thus they knew that their path did not lie north; therefore, as east or south would have been to return by land or by sea, they went west, and came to the Mediterranean Sea at Troas. Here came positive direction; not merely negative as before. "A vision appeared to Paul by night: There was a man of Macedonia standing, beseeching him, and saying, Come over into Macedonia and help us." This was enough.

Paul and his companion now understood that another continent was to receive the Gospel light. But what an enterprise! How make arrangements for such a journey? How provide the money? How take precautions for health? How simple was the preparation of these early missionaries! They went forth, talking all circumstances from the hand of the Lord (Rom. 8:28), believing that he made himself responsible for all; that they went at his charges; and that he undertook to supply all their need (Phil. 4:19). Paul, the leader, always made the Gospel without charge, by working for his daily bread when necessary, and where there were no disciples ready and eager to lodge them, they worked to obtain board and lodging.

Following the coast line, the travelers first touched at the island of Samothracia, and their first port in Europe was Neapolis, after which they landed at Philippi, the first city of the district and a Roman colony" (R.V.). For a few days nothing was done but the important preparatory work of prayer, without which no work is of any avail. And on the Sabbath day they found outside the city a place where prayer was wont to be made—probably some awakened Gentiles who had heard of the true God, and who were seeking after him, were gathered here. Only women are named, and to them the missionaries spoke, and not in vain; they found prepared ground for their message. One of these women, Lydia, from Thyatira, who worshiped God, a proselyte to the Jewish faith, but who still felt her deep spiritual need, "heard us, whose heart the Lord opened to give heed unto the things which were spoken by Paul." In these days the power of the Holy Ghost was such that one who believed and who received the Holy Ghost, as was then usually the case, was immediately baptized. In this case her household shared the blessing.

We do not learn whether the household all met with the Lord in that one gathering at the place of prayer (ver. 16), but probably it was so, if we judge by what follows—an immediate invitation to come to her house. "If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come to my house, give me the privilege of ministering to the Lord in his servants, and abide here." "And she constrained us." The simplicity of hospitality, the simplicity of traveling, mostly on foot, and of living, etc., in those days, made missionary work quite another thing from now, and the opened heart counted it a joy and privilege to take in these missionaries for many days" (ver. 18). The place of prayer became the place of testimony, too. No record is given here, as elsewhere, of many turning to the Lord. And yet the Church of Philippi, founded at this time, was one for every remembrance of which Paul gave thanks to God, and for which his continual supplications was with joy; so that we cannot doubt many souls were added to the Lord.

SILENCE OF JEHOVAH

BY DR. A. C. FERGUSON

SILENCE in the heavens, save the music of the spheres;
Silence of Jehovah 'mid the ages' rolling years;
Silence, while eternal laws do execute his will;
Silence, while he keepeth watch and promises fulfil.

Silence of the Force that rolls worlds round the solar throne;
Silence of the boundless Light that bathes the lands unknown;
Silence, when a seed doth die to blend and bloom and bear—
Silence of Jehovah, guarding all with tender care!

Silence of Jehovah, o'er human souls' deep woe;
Silence, while the Prince of Hell seems victor o'er his foe;
Silence, while bleeding hearts send pleadings up in vain;
Silence, as in Right's dark night we ask: "Does God still reign?"

But listen, soul! Thou canst not see veiled Glory's world nearby—
Supernal life and joy find birth in pain and sorrow's sigh!
The charming realm of love, hid now away from human sight,
Awaits the mortal life to bless, silent as angel's flight!

The mists and blackness of these scenes may not be rifted now,
He answers not the eager quest of when, or where, or how?

And, though our eyes cannot behold his chariots rolling by,
Soul-voices whisper restful truth: "It is a gain to die!"

A FLY

is not as harmless as it seems. It brings into the house many undesirable things which it picks up with its hairy, cup-shaped feet. Among them are disease germs. After a fly has entered your home it is a menace to your family's health—you should make it harmless. But you cannot do it without which catches the fly and the germs it carries and coats them both over with a varnish from which they can never escape. Poisoning the fly will not do,—as the germ is not poisoned. Harmony and Health Health is the reflection of Harmonious Nature. Disease is Discord and Unnatural. Health depends upon Natural Food.

SHREDDED WHEAT BISCUIT

is a Naturally Organized Food, that is, contains all the Properties in Correct Proportion necessary to Nourish every Element of the human body.

Nature has stored in the whole wheat complete nourishment for the harmonious building of man, and Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit presents it in the most digestible and appetizing form. If valuable qualities are removed from the wheat, as in white flour, the result is food stripped of the properties which produce teeth, bone, muscle and brain. "Soft cooked" cereals are swallowed with little or no mastication and, therefore, the teeth are robbed of their necessary—natural—exercise, causing weakness and decay. Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit being crisp, compels vigorous mastication and induces the natural flow of saliva which is indispensable in natural digestion.

Question of the Week

Do the marriages of Americans with foreign aristocrats and nobility tend to weaken our republican institutions, or otherwise?

A Canadian View of the Case

The marriages of Americans with foreign aristocrats and nobility tend to strengthen republican institutions. There is danger of republicanism becoming too republican. To be extreme, weakens any true cause. From the absurd extreme that birth and titles are everything, we naturally rebound to the extreme that is equally absurd, that there is nothing in birth, but that all men are born equal. We inherit the form, health, and tendencies of body, the talent of mind, and moral proclivities. Where blue blood is scorned, dangers are imminent; for there is at least more in the blood than in the pocket-book. True worth is not in titles nor in wealth, but it is in character; and our parents have had much to do with our inner life, by their life in reproduction and in early training. Our institutions should be modeled so as to do the most for succeeding generations by the highest development—moral and spiritual—of the present. Families allied to aristocracy will emphasize the importance of living rightly for the children's sake. The scorn of royalty and titles prevents the assimilating what is good in their institutions.

A. W. LEWIS.

They Endanger Our Institutions

A government like ours, "of the people, by the people and for the people," where "every man's a sovereign," is conditioned upon the substantial equality of all. Aristocracy and democracy cannot co-exist on the same soil. Therefore, we should view with alarm the presence and growth among us of aristocracies, titled or untitled, whether founded upon wealth, intelligence, social standing, military renown, political power or corporate privilege. These are real, not imaginary dangers, and can be held in check only by an overwhelming public sentiment. Matrimonial alliances with foreign nobility tend towards a social aristocracy decidedly hostile to the spirit of our institutions.

J. G. OSBORNE.

Such Marriages Beneficial All 'Round

I think well-considered marriages of this kind are calculated to be beneficial all 'round. With all America's profession of democracy, there is probably no country in which mere wealth is so much adored. In Britain, on the other hand, there is far too high a value set on rank and title. When these two elements mix, therefore, as in marriage, the result ought to be beneficial to both. Democracy is elevated and refined, while aristocracy is broadened and humanized. Then, as these marriages multiply, the two nations draw closer together, knowing and trusting each other more and more. This growing family unity is more hopeful for peace than any possible national treaty.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

a love of court, with its titles and display. From emulation of European society the step to imitation is short. A demand for titled foreigners would soon be supplemented by a demand for titled Americans. This would form a nucleus around which class feeling would cluster until its force would be strong enough to compel the formation of an American aristocracy. 2. The women who marry peers would carry their republican ideas into their new surroundings. Their husbands would be influenced by these ideas. As they are the governing class, any change of sentiment in them would produce a corresponding change in the policy of the government. Monarchies would tend to become more liberal, in time a demand for republican institutions might follow. The children of such marriages would be brought up in liberal ideas by their mothers. This early training would tend to make them semi-republican.

A. W. GRIGG.

No Danger from such Marriages

That an occasional woman goes from our shores to accept a title in the Old World aristocracy will not demoralize those who are her friends, and who yet see that such titles are empty and hollow. Upon the whole, such marriages furnish a wider intercourse and a broader field of observation, in which our people will be more firmly grounded in the faith that worth makes the man, and that the "land of liberty" furnishes the best soil in the world upon which to grow individual worth.

C. P. ATKINSON.

An Alternative Suggested

Marriage with American aristocrats and nobility is bad enough; with foreign it is de-aristocratic title, cannot be said to threaten any danger to our republican institutions, as they are built upon too firm a foundation for that to be possible.

ALICE F. BOYNTON.

Miscellaneous Questions

Reader, Thornton, Ind. Do the accounts in the Gospels of our Lord's temptation imply that his divine or his human nature was tempted?

You cannot separate the one from the other. The temptation was applied to him as one being. The temptation to turn the stones into bread was of course based on his human appetite, which, after his long fast, would be clamorous for food. The temptation to cast himself from a pinnacle was a test of his consciousness of divine sonship. The tempter practically said: "If you are really the Son of God, here is an opportunity of proving it, for this promise applies to you." The third temptation was to his ambition. It offered an easy means of attaining success, which by other means would be arduous and difficult. There is no doubt that the temptation was a very real one. We cannot suppose it to have been a mere sham.

E. H., Friendship, Ind. Is there any scriptural ground for thinking that animals are immortal? What did Ecclesiastes mean by speaking (Eccles. 3: 21) of the spirit of the beast that goeth downward?

We know of no passage of scripture that affords any ground for such a belief. Ecclesiastes was in one of his pessimistic moods when he wrote that passage. He gave expression to a doubt which at one time or other crossed the mind of many thinking men. It has often seemed as if, as he says, man hath no preeminence over a beast. Death is the end of both alike, so far as their existence in the world is concerned. It is true we draw a distinction between them, and believe that at death a man's spirit goes upward to God while the spirit of the beast goes with his body into the earth; but who sees it, who knows it for a certainty? That is Ecclesiastes' meaning; but he had better moods and in the end a clearer view of man's duty and mission in life.

G. G., New York City, writes of the national vice of profanity:

"Cleanliness is necessary, but moral purity is much more so. I don't say we can put a new heart in profane men; that is God's work through the Gospel; but we can do some good by discouraging swearing. If God means to use this nation to do great things in this world, it should strive to purify itself, in order to be ready and fit for the work, when God calls."

B. C., Union City, Tenn. If a person lives right to the best of his knowledge and tries to do right, and if his way of living proves to have been wrong, will he be credited for trying to do right?

A man is bound to use every means to ascertain what is right and not to be satisfied with mere opinion. In a court of law, a wrongdoer would be punished for breaking the law, even if he did not know of the existence of the law that he broke. It is his duty to know the law, and ignorance is not a valid defence, though it might be pleaded in mitigation of punishment. There should in moral and religious matters be study of the Word of God, earnest prayer for the enlightenment and guidance of the Holy Spirit and becoming deference to the opinions of men who have given a lifetime to the study of divine things. Not necessarily an acceptance of those opinions, but careful attention to them, with the view of ascertaining if they are right. There ought also and chiefly to be faith in Christ and an earnest endeavor to follow him. Credit for trying to do right will not be of avail if a man has rejected Christ.

D. M. B., Montpelier, Ia. There is no such thing as a "cold lightning stroke," although it is true that all lightning strokes are not followed by conflagration.

Mr. A. C. Maulden, of Memphis, Tenn., for twelve years a reader of this journal, writes that he has quite a library of books he has received as premiums, besides many others, including pictures, calendars, roller organ, etc. He adds, "May the editor live long. My little girl, Bess, looks for the paper's weekly coming."

HOW A FAMINE ORPHANAGE WAS STARTED WITH ONE DOLLAR

At Hange, a town twenty miles from Ahmednagar, India, new buildings have been erected, and some of the famine boys are beginning a poultry farm. The buildings were made of stone, from an old government barracks. As it was government property, it could not be given, but it was sold to Dr. R. A. Hume for one dollar. The new buildings were put up by famine sufferers, and now house CHRISTIAN HERALD famine orphans.

The Evils of Marrying for a Title

International marriages, so-called, undoubtedly have a tendency to weaken our social and political institutions. To assimilate to any great extent the customs of the foreign titled class would be to invite disintegration of our national structure—a structure reared by the rugged patriots, whose principles were above stilted social forms, above empty titles, above aristocratic lineage. International marriages are injurious, because they induce discontent in many, because they frequently result disastrously to all parties concerned, and because they are in most cases mere matters of barter—a fortune on one side being traded for a title on the other. Each party to the marriage is merely seeking aggrandizement—one through the power that money brings, the other through the glamour of a title. We often hear the expression "buying a title," and this phrase expresses the matter in a truthful and literal manner. All this is foreign to the principles of true Americanism, and must necessarily be injurious to our national system.

A. L. VERMILYA.

They Have a Twofold Influence

The effect is twofold (1) on American society, (2) on European society. 1. The desire to marry a titled foreigner shows a decay of republican spirit. The leaders of society being the leaders of woman's thought throughout all classes, this desire on their part tends to instill into the minds of all our young women structive. Our own aristocrats soon run out for want of new and healthy blood. Inter-marrying, they soon become extinct. City people, even of the great middle class, would soon become demoralized and die off, if it were not for the constant incoming of fresh blood and good morals from the pure country. Much more, the pampered children of luxury, ease and discontent. Instead of looking to the aristocrats and nobility on foreign shores for companions, it would be far safer to seek them among the sons and daughters of toil in the most obscure places of the smallest nations. This would be better for individual happiness and prosperity and for the perpetuity of our American institutions. Much good can still come out of despised Nazareth and little Bethlehem.

W. J. MOSIER.

Approved in the Golden State

There is no reason why the marriages of Americans with foreign aristocrats and nobility should tend to weaken our republican institutions. To the contrary, the majority of such marriages seem to have been a benefit to the country in bringing it to the notice of Europeans, and acquainting them with its inhabitants. The only evils that arise are the wealth these marriages takes out of our country, and the possibility of causing our people to bestow an American homage upon titled aristocrats. But so long as these marriages remain so greatly in the minority, the few Americans who exchange their riches for an

Picturesque Matanzas and its Natural Beauties—Its Wonderful Underground Caves Described

By CHARLES M. PEPPER.

LIKE Matanzas. It has more attractions for the stranger than any town in the new republic of Cuba. Also, it is one of the oldest, and has a wonderfully interesting history, going back a couple of hundred years, when the inhabitants had to protect themselves from the pirates. It is only a little more than two hours' run out from Havana on the railroad, or a few hours sail along the coast. Then we have hill and valley and river and sea. These make grand scenery. The town proper lies like a bowl, the palm-clad hills forming the rim. The bay of Matanzas is like an inland lake, and its entrance is like the wriggling path of a snake. The beach is a very fine one—one of the few good beaches on the north coast of Cuba.

Matanzas, above all things, is famous for the Yumuri Valley and the Caves of Bellamar. Tourists come from Europe to view the Valley of the Yumuri, and say there is nothing finer in Switzerland. To see it in all its grandeur, it is necessary to climb the hill of Monserrate. Devout Catholics from Catalonia and the Balearic Islands, have erected on the summit of this hill a votive chapel. I visited it once, when the soldiers of Spain were guarding it from the threatened attacks of the insurgents, and at a time when most of the country was desolate. But now all is fresh and green again, and to look down on the Valley of Yumuri from this height and watch the winding river, or to muse on the stately palm trees, is one of the pleasures of a lifetime.

In the town of Matanzas proper, or out beyond it, was lost there. He was an American sailor, named George Lewis, and had come there to claim his bride. The morning before the wedding-day, he set out to explore one of the caverns. He was never heard of again. His bride became a raving maniac.

The caves which make Matanzas famous, however, are not along the Yumuri, but on the other side of the town, miles away. These are the caves of Bellamar, and are among the real wonders of the world. I have visited them several times. The first occasion was just after the close of the war. In the first stages of the insurrection, the insurgents had made these caves their hiding-place, but later, Spanish troops were stationed there, and they were closed, though not until after the insurgents had blown up with dynamite a house which had been built over the entrance. My privilege was to be one of the first to enter, after the caves had been sealed for years. It was an adventurous rather than a hazardous trip. One of my guides was an old Chinaman, Justo, who claimed to have re-discovered the caves mite figures seemed like little old men of the mountains; others, like giants. There were also resemblances to the elephant and other animals, and a vast number of pillars and columns formed by the limestone drippings, or the coming together of the stalactites and the stalagmites. There were skeletons and sentries, as it seemed, of marble, and Egyptian mummies in stone. There were also a dozen figures, which were called "The Twelve Apostles," and cascades of crystal. One very beautiful formation of spotless white is called "The Virgin's Cloak."

Since my first exploration of the caves at Bellamar, I have visited them many times, and always with increased delight and a deeper reverence for the marvels of the Almighty.

Matanzas province, and the adjoining province of Santa Clara, form the great sugar producing region of the island. Here is seen plantation life in all its varied forms. Usually there is the "casa de vivienda" or residence of the planter, a great, roomy house only one story in height, and with tropical flower gardens surrounding it. Then there are the "barracones," or quarters for the plantation hands, and numerous small outbuildings; but the crowning feature of the big plantation is the central or sugar mill. Many of these were destroyed during the insurrection. A sugar mill costs anywhere from $500,000 up to $1,000,000. It has the latest improved machinery, and is like a vast engine puffing and blowing, always in motion. The season for long one side of the bay, is the grim old castle of San Severino. It is one of the oldest in the land, and with its moats and drawbridges and ancient cannon, is a real reminder of Spanish fortresses of the Middle Ages. It has, too, many reminders of Spanish cruelty, but its walls now tell no tales.

Limestone formations are found all around Matanzas. In the Yumuri Valley there are many caverns, resulting from these formations. A great many years ago some of them were explored, but they usually led into blind tunnels, and were dangerous. One of the tragic stories which is still told is that of a beautiful girl, whose lover thirty or forty years ago. My guides had long candles, larger than a walking-stick. One guide went before, and one behind the tourist. There were great, vaulted chambers, with thousands of stalactites pendant from the roof, like a chandelier; narrow tunnel passages, through which we could not walk erect; pools of dark water, into which there was danger of plunging, and thousands of fantastic formations. Some of the stalaggrinding the cane begins well along in December, and lasts till May. Then the whole plantation seems instinct with life. There is steady work on the plantation for the field hands about nine months out of the twelve. Work begins at five o'clock in the morning and continues until the middle of the forenoon. Then there is a long rest followed by a fair afternoon's labor. In the evening, the social life of the plantation hands begins, which consists in visiting among themselves, exchanging gossip, singing and serenading or playing their guitars. To a visitor, it seems to be a happy and contented life.

CHRIST'S PHOTOGRAPH

TEXT—II. Cor. 4: 6: "The face of Jesus Christ"

CHARACTER is stamped upon the human face. By that I do not mean a good man necessarily has a beautiful face and a bad man a homely face. Some of the most sinful men have the handsomest faces. The morally corrupt and evil-minded Edward IV. of England, had a face of such singular beauty that it became the idol of London. When the king asked a rich lady for ten pounds to help carry on the war against France, she replied: "For thy comely face, thou shalt have twenty." When the king kissed her with his smiling lips, the rich old lady made the gift forty pounds instead of twenty. On the other hand, some of the kindest and best men have facial features which snock every artistic idea of harmonious proportions. But when I state that character can be read in the face, I mean that if a man is a good man there is generally something in the smile of his lip, the glance of his eye, the wrinkles of his cheek, the set of his jaw, which suggests that he is a good man. If a man is bad, there are telltale signs in the face which prove that he is a bad man.

By long and bitter experience, you have learned that the revealing power of the face is true. You have also learned that your wife can read the character in the human face a great deal better than her husband. When a younger man, you used to bring your friends home to spend the evening. After those friends had gone, you would turn and say: "My dear, how did you like Mr. so and so?" Your wife would answer, "I do not like him at all. He is not a man to be trusted. You had better beware, and not get mixed up in any business dealings with that man. I do not like his face." Or, your wife would answer, "I like that man. I wish you would invite him up again to the house. I like his eye and the curve of his lip. I like his face." In almost every case, as you found out later, your wife's estimate of your friends' characters was right. She judged them by the face.

After my father died, I stayed alone with his body for two nights. We were alone, as we often used to be, when traveling around the world together. One night, as I sat there by his side, I found myself speaking aloud. I was startled by the sound of my own voice, as I soliloquized, "No man could have had a face like that unless he was a good man."

My Father had the Index of his beautiful life stamped upon his face, even in the unconscious pose of death.

Now Paul declares that the glory of God was revealed to man in the face of Jesus Christ. As we have no authentic picture of Jesus, I would try to paint a word-picture of the Divine face by recounting some of Christ's mental and spiritual characteristics.

This was the method by which we obtained a picture of my brother, after he was dead. For years before his demise, he had not been to a photographer. So, after the funeral, we took to an artist all the pictures which my brother had taken in his boyhood. We also took a lock of his hair. We told the artist about my brother's happy nature; told how the jokes which he perpetrated would be revealed in his smile and laughing eye. We talked about his nature, so that the artist might paint that nature in the young man's face.

Emperor William the First, of Germany, wanted an artist to paint the face of his mother, Princess Louise, as she was when in the prime of her physical beauty. He took all the different pictures of the dead empress to the artist's studio. There the royal son told that artist the characteristics of his mother. From his verbal portraiture, that artist painted the famous ideal picture of Princess Louise descending the steps of her palace. May God help me to-day to paint aright the face of Jesus Christ!

Jesus must have had an intelligent face. Phrenologists teach that the seat of the brain is under the dome of the skull. They assert that certain characteristics of the brain can be read by the contour of the skull, as a blind man with his fingers, reads by the raised letters of the Braille alphabet. But the intelligence of the brain can be traced in the face, as well as upon the top of the head, in the formation of the mouth as well as in the phrenological charts mapped off upon the back of the skull. The thin lip of the Caucasian is entirely different from the thick lip of the African. The deep-set eyes and overhanging brows of the university scholar are totally different from the twinkling eyes and narrow frontal bones of the Australian aborigines. Some men's faces are so expressive, that when they turn their keen eyes upon you, they seem to bore a hole right into the heart of your very being. If you try to deceive them, the look upon their faces reveals the fact that they know you are not telling the truth.

Ormsby Mitchell, the astronomer, one day was making some dial observations. As the sun was setting, a hill seven miles away was focused by the cyclopiian eye of the telescope. While the astronomer was seated there in his observatory, he saw two boys stealing apples from an orchard which grew upon the top of that hill. So some men's eyes are such intelligent, penetrative eyes, that they seem to have been watching you, even when you were miles away.

Daniel Webster's Personality

Bayard Taylor relates a remarkable incident of the power of Daniel Webster's eye and face. During the time when the Senator from Massachusetts was being bitterly assailed in his own State and abroad, in company with James Russell Lowell and a party of Harvard classmates, Taylor went to a Boston meeting with the avowed intention of interrupting Mr. Webster's speech and turning his remarks into ridicule. "When Mr. Webster arose to speak," wrote Bayard Taylor, "he turned his great eyes upon us students. As he did so, he seemed to us to read our very thoughts. The intelligence of his face seemed to speak volumes, although his lips had not yet parted. We college boys came to scoff. We dared not move, so subdued were we at the sight of that great lawyer's face."

Go with me where you will, into the studies of the great masters of the law, of literature, music, sculpture, or the sciences, and almost without exception, the intelligence of these mental giants has been made manifest in their faces. A Hugo, a Tennyson, a Dante, a Milton, a Luther, a Calvin, all prove by their physiognomy that this statement is true. So Christ must have had an intelligent face. It was not, as some artists have painted it, the face of an impractical dreamer nor of a fanatic nor of an effeminate nonentity. His was the face of one who had a masterful mind. When we begin to study Christ's face, we are impressed with the conviction that his eye was that the brain back of that face was an omnipotent brain, that the ear was an all-hearing ear. That face revealed the fact that Christ knew all from eternity past to eternity to come. But what is more important to us personally, when we look upon Christ's face, is that we intuitively feel Christ knows every thought and hope and deed of our lives. He knows what we have done, and what we would have liked to do.

As a little child, when I would be sent to bed for having done wrong, I could see in the darkness of the bedroom, the face of Christ hovering over and watching me. I used to bury my head in the pillow and cover myself up completely with the bedclothes, yet I could not blot out that Christ face. It always seemed to me to be looking when I did wrong. Christ's face was watching me with an all-seeing eye. Yes, Christ must have had an intelligent face, for it was an omniscient face.

Jesus Christ's face was also a sympathetic and forgiving face. How many men we have seen whose faces represented intelligent power, but without mercy. Faces such as you could easily imagine a Robespierre might have had, or a King Richard, who murdered the princes in the Tower, or a Frankenstein, or any of the great leaders of the Inquisition. Those were the faces of men like Napoleon, who hearing a marshal of France, after a bloody battle, express regret over the awful slaughter of human life, replied, "Oh, that is nothing. In order to make an omelette, you must break a few eggs." Those were the faces of men like Prince Nawab, who drove 146 British prisoners into the Black Hole of Calcutta, a stifling room only eighteen feet square, and left them there until the misery of all but twenty-three was ended by suffocation. Those were the kind of faces that must have been possessed by men like Nana Sahib, the fiend of Cawnpore, and women like Catherine de Medici, the evil spirit of Saint Bartholomew's massacre when thirty thousand French Huguenots were slain in one day.

A Child's Question

But all strong faces are not evil faces. Some of the strongest faces we have ever seen have been the sweetest and most magnanimous. These faces had a love-attracting power for the beholders, like the face of old Doctor Plumer, one of the strongest men the American pulpit ever produced. Doctor Plumer's face was a sweet and tender and loving face, although one of the strongest of faces. One day, as he was walking across a Pittsburg park, a little child ran up to him and took his hand. Then, looking up into that great, good face—a face that never had any bitterness against any one, but only forgiveness—the child asked, "I say, mister, are you God?" So, we must not think of Christ's face only as an intelligent face, a face of power, but also as a loving, sympathetic, forgiving face. We must think of him as having the same kind of a face your earthly father may have had. You remember when, in the past, you did what your father had forbidden, you came to his side and buried your face in his lap and cried, "Father, will you forgive me?" Then you remember how he took you up in his great, strong arms. What a sweet look came into his loving face! How his lip trembled and his eyes filled with tears, as he said, "My boy, my dear little son, I was in hopes that you would come to me as you have done. My heart was almost breaking, my child, because you did wrong. But it was breaking the more, because my little son did not come to his father and ask to be forgiven." And then, you found that the tears which trickled down your cheek were not those which came from your eyes alone. Mingled with them were the tears which flowed from your earthly parent's eyes. Yes, our Christ's face, although a strong face, was a sympathetic face.

Expressive of Forgiveness

And my Christ's face must have been a forgiving face, because it was such an intelligent face. He knows all that we have done and suffered. He also well knows how hard some of us have struggled in our own strength to do right. He knows how we have grappled, each of us with his own besetting sin, which we dare not tell to any human ear. He knows, yes he knows, how impossible it is for us to succeed in battling that sin in our own strength. So, when we come to Christ to ask for help to resist the evil present and to avert the evil future, as well as to wipe out the evil past, oh then, the strong face of Christ becomes a tender, sympathetic, forgiving face. Our Saviour's eyes will fill with tears of joy. Our Saviour's lip will quiver. Our Saviour's look will be one of pardon and of unutterable love.

Christ's face is a scarred face. "No, no," says some one, "please do not tell me that my Christ's face is a scarred face. I have always thought of Jesus' face as the most beautiful ever owned by man. I have always believed his face was as beautiful as the Christ face described in the exquisite portrait carved upon an emerald by the order of Tiberius Cæsar: 'His forehead was plain and very delicate. His face was without spot or wrinkle, beautified with a lovely red. His nose and mouth were so formed that nothing could be reprehended. His beard was thickish, in color like his hair, not very long, but forked. His look was innocent and mature. His eyes were clear and quick. He was a man for his singular beauty, surpassing the children of men.'"

But, my friends, that portrait of Christ's face which was carved upon the emerald by Cæsar's order, has been proven by the archæologists to have been a description taken from a spurious tablet. It was a forgery, and was not written until two hundred years after Christ's death. So, in order to find whether or no Christ's face was a scarred face, we must turn to the words of the Bible. Was his forehead scarred? Oh, yes, the crucifiers plaited a crown of thorns upon his head. As the sharp thorns were driven into the white skin, the blood must have flowed. The skin must have been lacerated. Read from Isa. 52: 14: "His visage was so marred, more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men." Turn to the 14th chapter of Mark: "And some began to spit on him, and to cover his face and to buffet him, and to say unto him, Prophesy; and the servants did strike him with the palms of their hands." After the agonies of the crucifixion, could Christ's face be other than a scarred face?

Eloquent Scars

And Christ's face is a scarred face, because it is the face of One who realized the awful nature of sin. Though Christ could forgive us our sins by the sacrifice of blood, yet he could not take away the punishment for sin. So he offered his own face to be lacerated. He offered his eyes to become glassy in death. Yet, the scarred and disfigured face of Christ will be more beautiful to the redeemed spirits in the heavenly land than if those divine features were without spot or blemish. The scars upon his face will appeal to us in the same way that the wrinkles upon our mother's face touched our hearts when she lay asleep in the casket. We looked at the wrinkles, and said, "That wrinkle came when she took care of me while I was sick with diphtheria. This wrinkle came when my brother died. That other wrinkle came when she was preparing my clothes for college. Yonder wrinkle came the night I was married and left home." Therefore, to us children, those wrinkles were beautiful, because they told the story of her vicarious love and suffering. Yes, in heaven, we want to see our mother's wrinkles, that came as the battle scars of life, while fighting for her children. In heaven we also want to see the scarred face of Jesus, which scars were cut into his fair skin while suffering for our redemption.

When Alexander the Great had his portrait painted

DR. TALMAGE AND "AUNT MARY" A TOUCHING INCIDENT OF HIS VISIT TO MEXICO CITY, JUST BEFORE HIS LAST ILLNESS

ON Saturday, March 1, the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, with his wife and daughter, arrived in Mexico City about mid-day, and took rooms at the Sanz Hotel—a central location overlooking our beautiful Alameda. Toward evening, the Rev. H. A. Bassett, pastor of Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, learning that the famous preacher was in the city, called, and secured his kind consent to preach next morning.

As it was learned that Dr. Talmage's stay in Mexico would be a brief one, and this probably the only opportunity to hear him preach, an invitation was at once given to the Union Church of which Rev. Ellsworth Lawson is pastor, and the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of which Rev. F. S. Onderdonk is pastor, to bring their English-speaking congregations and join in the service. Though the time was short for advertising purposes, next morning, at half past ten, the spacious auditorium of Trinity Church was crowded with an expectant and attentive audience. It was one of the largest English-speaking congregations ever gathered for religious services in the Mexican capital.

The Doctor, though far from well, said little about it, and, in the pulpit, no signs of feebleness were noticeable. He preached a comforting and soul-stirring sermon on "Garrison Duty," from the text, "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff." I. Sam. 19: 24. No pen can do it justice. It should have been heard to be appreciated. The occasion was unique, and the edifice historic and the preacher felt the inspiration of both. His ever warm heart and lucid mind poured forth Bible facts, apt illustrations from history, with burning appeal and comforting application, for nearly an hour.

The struggle for religious liberty in Mexico—the confiscation of the immense and ill-gotten ecclesiastical property—the establishment of the Reform Laws, including liberty of worship and press, as well as the seemingly providential steps by which a part of this convent came to be a Methodist church, all absorbed the good Doctor's attention and brought out many pointed questions from him. It served also to revive his relations, several years back, with William Butler, he founder of Missions in India and Mexico, whom he declared to be one of his heroes.

Monday and Tuesday, in company with his family, Dr. Talmage visited points of interest in and around the capital, the afternoon of the second day being spent on General Frisbie's ranch, a few miles away. On returning to the hotel, soon after dark, he found four of us waiting to see him. His greeting could not have been more cordial. After a little persuading on our part, gently seconded by his estimable wife, he consented to lecture for us Friday night. Every effort was made by the missionaries of the city and the members of the English-speaking congregations to make a success of the occasion. But imagine our disappointment when, late that Friday afternoon, the attending physician, who had been called in on account of what seemed to be an attack of influenza, positively forbade Dr. Talmage leaving his room.

So anxious was he to keep his promise to lecture, that it required both the firm authority of the physician and the earnest pleading of the wife to keep him indoors. Of course, hundreds were disappointed; but ticket money, so far as possible, was returned, and the sympathy of our entire colony centered in the sick-room.

Two days later, the physician decided that his patient must be removed from this altitude (for our city is about 7,300 feet above sea level). Before the party left to take the north-bound express, I spent half or three-quarters of an hour in the sick-room. Dr. Talmage reiterated his regrets at not being able to lecture. I said to him: "Don't worry about that, Doctor; we know you were as disappointed as we were. What we now desire is your best welfare." Then I ventured to add, "Doctor, do you know that a dear old Englishwoman, who is generally called 'Aunt Mary,' came all the way from her mountain home in the country to hear your lecture, arriving at my house about dusk Friday evening? That morning she took a stage and rode down the mountain side to Pachuca, from which place, after dinner, she took railway, and in four hours more reached this city. She walked in as we were at our evening meal and announced, 'I have come to hear Mr. Talmage.'"

The Doctor's face lighted up as he listened, and as we finished, the tears were rolling down his cheeks. He looked up and said, "Is that so? Give her my love, and tell her that when we get 'over yonder' we will sit down and talk it all over."

His loving message kept "Aunt Mary" smiling all the three days she was in our house, and sent her back to her mountain home a happier and better woman. And from several sources, we hear that that glad message is being repeated to many an English miner who comes across "Aunt Mary's" path. That message was a brief but, perhaps, one of Dr. Talmage's most eloquent sermons. He, a few minutes later, accompanied by his family and physician, was en route to his home in Washington.

The rest of the story is well known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He is already "over yonder," while many an Aunt Mary, as well as thousands of younger ones, helped by his ministry in widely-parted fields, are living in fond and certain hope of "talking it all over" with him "some bright day."

JOHN W. BUTLER.

Christ's Photograph

He made the artist represent him with his head resting upon his hand. The emperor did this so that his forefinger might cover up a deep scar which was slashed into his right cheek by the sword of an enemy. But when the Bible paints for us Christ's face, it does not cover up one of the divine scars. To the Christian, the most beautiful parts of the divine face should be the places which reveal to us how Christ suffered and died that we might live.

The scarred face of Christ is an illumined face. Have you ever seen a sad countenance light up with a smile? Have you ever heard a little child burst forth into a laugh in the midst of a fit of crying,—laugh when a tear is yet glistening upon the wet cheek? Well, Christ's face, though in one sense a sad face, a scarred face, is yet an illumined face. It has joy in the eye, joy on the lip, joy in the cheek, joy everywhere, when one of his loved ones has been saved by the sacrifice of his blood. There is more joy in that divine face over one sinner that repenteth, than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance.

If Christ's had not been an illumined face, the little children would not have loved to run to him. Children are attracted by a smile. They are afraid of tears. Yet everywhere, as Jesus' smiling face appears, we can hear the children calling to one another. "Come! come! Here is Jesus, Come! come!" If Jesus' face was not an illumined face, he could never have spoken such triumphant words as those which he spoke to him sick of the palsy, "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven thee." He could never have spoken such words of commendation as those he spoke in reference to the Centurion: "Verily, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." And, Oh, my brother, our sins are making the Saviour's face such a sad face, and if our repentance will make Christ's face such an illumined face, should we not be willing to brighten our Saviour's face since it has suffered so much?

But the sweetest thought to me of all is that Christ's face is a face that wants to be loved. Some portraits have an indescribable something about them which proves that those faces crave affection. If the closed lips could speak, they would say, "I live for others, in order that others might live for me. I love, in order that I can be loved. I suffer, in order that others can be made happy. And being happy, they can pour out their gratitude upon me."

I only awoke to the fact, a few years ago, that Christ's face was a face that wanted to be loved. I used to think that I must love Christ because Christ could, and would save me if I asked him. But now, I have learned to love him, because he loves me and wants me to love him. He loves me with a love that passeth all understanding. But that love is incomplete, unless I respond to it and love as I am loved. Mr. Moody told a pathetic story how, a short time after his father's death, his elder brother ran away from home. Then he described how his mother used to be continually watching for the return of the prodigal; how she would send the children every day down to the post-office, to find out if there were a letter from her absent boy. They would hear her praying at night for the return of her son, that he might give her his love. Well, to-day, Christ's face is a face craving affection.

Are you ready to satisfy the cravings for affection which are pictured upon Christ's face? Are you willing to have your face stamped upon Christ's heart? If you would, you cannot have your face there alone. There are many faces imprinted upon his heart, and yet all these faces blend into one. These faces, which are stamped upon the tender, living, forgiving heart of Christ, make a composite picture. When you graduated from college, the photographer made a composite picture of your class. He took all the different photographs of the members and passed them rapidly before the camera's eye. Then the various photographs were combined in a single picture, and that was called the class portrait. So, upon Christ's heart, there is a composite picture. That composite portrait is made up of your Christian mother's and father's faces, your Christian wife's and child's faces; it is made from the faces of the Christian men and women who have died in the past, and of those who are living to-day. Will you have your face in this composite picture, which is ineffaceably stamped upon the great heart of Christ?

But, sad to relate, after all Christ has suffered and done for us, his face may be a condemning face. The divine love may be great enough to surpass all human understanding, yet the divine love is not blind. The Spirit of God will not always strive with man. In Ezekiel we read, "My face will I turn also from them." Oh, the awful moment when Christ's face, on account of our unrepented sins, shall become a condemning face! This is one characteristic of Christ which all unrepentant sinners and some ministers preaching in the sacred pulpits are trying not to see. But if Jesus is not to have a condemning face for the unrepentant sinner, how can you account for the parable of the shepherd separating the sheep from the goats? There is going to come a day when Christ shall gather before the judgment seat of God all the nations of the earth. Crash! crash! crash! will go every tombstone. The mausoleums shall rock and heave as the Philippian jail trembled during the night of Paul and Silas' incarceration. Every gate and slab door will fly open. The tall cemetery shafts shall tumble, as did the walls of Jericho at the blast of the ram's horn. The bodies of the sailors sleeping by the coral reefs, the emigrants who died when crossing the prairie, the arctic explorers buried under the snow and ice, the missionaries who died upon the Congo—they shall all come up. The dead which slept under the dome of a Taj Mahal, and the poor unknown patient who died in the county hospital and whose body was buried in Potter's field—shall come up. The bodies of the rich and the poor alike, the black and the white, the Jew and the Gentile, they shall all come up. Then Christ shall separate this multitude which is gathered before him, as a shepherd separates his sheep from the goats. Toward the sheep, the Saviour will turn a forgiving face. But towards the goats he shall turn a condemning face, when he says, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire." If Christ is not to have a condemning face to those who have not repented of their sins, how can you account for the scene in the parable of the ten virgins? As we read that parable we see the five foolish virgins who had not prepared for the Bridegroom's coming, standing without and pounding upon the door of the banquet hall. We soon hear them crying, "Lord, Lord, open unto us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not." Two men shall be working in the fields, the one shall be taken and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill, the one shall be taken and the other left. Two immortals shall be standing at the marriage altar, the one shall be taken and the other left. Oh, my friends, I beg and plead with you to look into the forgiving face of Christ while it is yet time. Do not let the Saviour's face ever become to you a condemning face.

When the apostate Julian was dying upon the field of battle, he looked up and saw the overhanging cross and the face of Jesus. Then he cried, "Thou, oh, Galilean, thou hast at last conquered." Shall we not one and all be conquered by the face of Jesus Christ. Conquered, not as the infidel was conquered, but conquered by the Christ-love. Conquered by our making complete surrender to him of our lives? Conquered by having our faces as his disciples engraved upon Christ's heart?

WITH quaint historic ceremonies, and with imposing magnificence, the highest dignitaries of the English church will assemble in Westminster Abbey on June 26, and, in the presence of the nobles of the realm, and the representatives of foreign governments, place the British crown on the head of His Majesty, Edward VII., declaring him, "By the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the sea, King, Defender of the Faith and Emperor of India."

THE KING IN HIS ROYAL ROBES

Time was when such a ceremony was a momentous one for the people of the country, when the monarch really did govern for good or ill, and do, or neglect to do, the duties that the ancient ritual pledges him to perform. The character of the man thus invested with the functions of royalty was, in those ancient times, a matter of serious concern for the weal or woe of his realm. But times have changed. The throne still exercises a potent influence on society, though its power is hedged about and curtailed by restrictions which prevent its occupant infringing the rights and liberties of the people. Secure in the possession of constitutional liberty, the public sees no danger in the pledges of fealty given at the coronation, and even enjoys a spectacle which in large degree has lost its force. As the various features of the quaint ceremony have a moral significance, reminiscent of the times when kings ruled as well as reigned, a description of them will interest our readers.

The importance of the ceremony of the Coronation has been fully recognized by foreign nations, each of which has appointed a special representative to attend. Our own government has designated the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, formerly Minister to France, to represent this country, and with him have been joined representatives of the Army and the Navy. Though the actual ceremony will be completed on June 26, there will be magnificent scenes subsequent thereto. On the following day, the King and Queen will make a formal procession through the streets of London, and on the next day there will be a grand naval review at Spithead, to which the other nations will send their finest warships. Still later there will be special entertainments connected with the Coronation. The King will give a grand garden party at Windsor Castle on June 30 and on July 5 the poor of London will be welcomed at a great feast which, in order to avoid the possibility of crowding at one place, will be spread in the various sections of the city, some in large buildings and others in great tents. Besides this, the occasion will be celebrated in all the cities and towns of England and Scotland at the expense of the municipal authorities. The streets are to be decorated and illuminated, and in the majority of cases free dinners for the poor are to be provided. It is intended to make the occasion memorable, and, though the total cost will be enormous, the British nation feels that as no such event has occurred in sixty-four years, the money may well be spent.

The actual ceremony will be a fatiguing one for the participants, and no easy task must it have been to memorize the various duties and the questions and responses. It will be unprecedented if it is performed without some hitch or blunder. The very articles of the regalia, so long unused that scarcely any one who witnessed the last ceremony will take part in this, are unfamiliar objects. They are said to be worth, inclusive of the gems set in them, fully a million dollars. For more than half a century they have reposed in the Tower of London, where a special officer was charged with their safe-keeping.

More than a year has elapsed since the King's advent to power was proclaimed, but the time has been fully occupied in preparation for the grand ceremony, and in the arrangement of the various parts assigned to the nobles who are entitled to participate. So eager were the prominent peers of the realm to have some share in the ceremony, that it was found necessary to organize a Court to pass on the claims they urged by historic right. It was not an easy matter to decide the validity of those claims.

On the morning of the eventful day the King and Queen will drive from their palace to the Abbey in their state carriage, and entering at the west door will pass up the aisle, followed by their attendants, to the raised platform erected for the occasion. After they have taken their seats on chairs set for them, the Archbishop of Canterbury announces in a loud voice: "Sirs, I present unto you King Edward, the undoubted king of this realm; Wherefore all you who are come this day to do your homage, are you willing to do the same?" He repeats the question as he turns to the south, north and west, and those present respond with an affirmative shout. The King and Queen then proceed to chairs set for them near the altar, where they sit while the litany is recited, and the Bishop of London preaches a short sermon. At its conclusion, the Archbishop of Canterbury, approaching the King, administers

Ireland, and the Dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on, and the respective laws and customs of the same?

King: I solemnly promise so to do.

Archbishop: Will you to your power cause Law and Justice, in Mercy, to be executed in all your judgments?

King: I will.

Archbishop: Will you, to the utmost of your power, maintain the Laws of God, the true Profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant Reformed Religion, established by Law? And will you maintain and preserve inviolably the Settlement of the Church of England, and the Doctrine, Worship, Discipline, and Government thereof, as by Law established in England? And will you preserve upon the Bishops and Clergy of England, and to the Church therein committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges as by Law do or shall appertain to them or any of them?

King: All this I promise to do.

Then the King, arising out of his chair, supported and assisted by the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Sword of State being carried before him, shall go to the altar, and there, being uncovered, make his solemn oath in the sight of all the people to observe the promises. Laying his right hand upon the Holy Gospel in the great Bible, which is now brought from the altar by the Archbishop, and tendered to him as he kneels upon the steps, saying these words:

The things which I have here before promised I will perform and keep. So help me God.

Then the King kisseth the Book and signeth the oath.

The King resumes his seat while the choir sing a hymn and the Archbishop offers a prayer. At its conclusion, an attendant takes from the King's shoulders his robe of state, and he takes his seat in an ancient chair in front of the altar. The Archbishop then takes a bowl of oil, and with a gold spoon anoints his head, the palms of both hands and his breast, saying as he does so, "Be thou anointed with holy oil, as kings priests and prophets were anointed, and as Solomon was anointed king by Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, so be you anointed, blessed, and consecrated King over this people, whom the Lord your God hath given you to rule and govern, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen."

The King is then vested with a robe made of cloth of gold, and girt with an embroidered girdle; spurs are set upon his heels, and a sword is given to him, the Archbishop saying:

With this sword do justice, stop the growth of iniquity, protect the Holy Church of God, help and defend widows and orphans, restore the things that are gone to decay, maintain the things that are restored, punish and reform what are amiss, and confirm what is in good order, that doing these things you may be glorious in all virtue, and so faithfully serve our Lord Jesus Christ in this life that you may reign forever with him in the life which is to come.

An imperial mantle is then placed on the King's shoulders, and the orb, a gold ball surmounted by a cross, is placed in his hand, at which the Archbishop says:

Receive this Imperial Robe and Orb, and the Lord your God endue you with knowledge and wisdom, with majesty and with power from on high. The Lord clothe you with the Robe of Righteousness and with the garments of salvation. And when you see this Orb set under the Cross, remember that the whole world is subject to the Power and Empire of Christ our Redeemer.

The regal ring is placed on the fourth finger of his right hand, and two sceptres are brought, one of which is surmounted by a cross, and the other by a dove, and are handed to him with the words:

Receive the Rod of Equity and Mercy, and God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed, direct and assist you in the administration and exercise of all those powers which he hath given you. Be so merciful that you be not too remiss, so execute judgment that you forget not Mercy. Punish the wicked, protect and cherish the just, and lead your people in the way wherein they should go.

Then comes the culmination of the ceremony. The Archbishop takes the crown in his hands, and, laying it on the altar, prays:

The Nave of Westminster Abbey

THE HISTORIC BUILDING IN WHICH THE CORONATION WILL TAKE PLACE

QUEEN ALEXANDRA AND HER PETS

From the latest portrait of Her Majesty

O God, the Crown of the faithful: Bless, we beseech thee, and sanctify this thy servant, Edward, our King; and as thou dost this day set a Crown of pure Gold upon his head, so enrich his royal heart with thine abundant grace, and crown him with all princely virtues, through the King Eternal, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen

He places it on the King's head, saying: "Be strong and of good courage: Observe the commandments of God, and walk in his holy ways. Fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold on eternal life; that in this world you may be crowned with success and honor, and when you have finished your course, receive a crown of righteousness, which God the righteous Judge shall give you in that day."

But the regalia is not yet complete. To the sword, the spurs, the sceptres, the orb and the crown is now added the Bible, which the Archbishop puts in his hands with the words: "We present you with this Book, the most valuable thing that this world affords. Here is Wisdom; this is the Royal Law; these are the lively Oracles of God."

The Archbishop then pronounces a solemn blessing on the King, praying that God will prosper his reign and that he may have a quiet empire, a faithful Parliament, wise and upright counsellors, loyal nobles, pious, learned, useful clergy and an honest and industrious commonalty.

The choir sings the Te Deum. At its close the King is conducted from the chair he has occupied to the throne on which he is seated, while the nobles bearing the sceptres and other regalia group themselves around it. The people shout, "God save King Edward," the silver trumpets are sounded, and outside, the gunners, seeing the signal which is given, fire a salute of artillery from the Tower.

Seated on his throne and wearing the royal crown the King receives the homage of his subjects in the order of rank. His son, the Prince of Wales, comes first. Removing the coronet from his own head and bending his knee, he says, "I do become your liege man of life and limb and of earthly worship, and faith and truth I will bear to you, to live and die against all manner of folks. So help me God." Rising, he touches the crown on the King's head and kisses him on the cheek. After the Prince of Wales, come in their order representatives of the Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, etc., who each repeat the same oath and salute the King in the same way.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, having thus completed the coronation of the King, takes his seat by the altar and the Archbishop of York proceeds to anoint and crown the Queen, the King witnessing the ceremony from his throne. The ceremony is much shorter in her case, and at its conclusion she is solemnly conducted to her throne and the peeresses put on their coronets.

The concluding part of the service is the office of the Communion. The King and Queen descend from their thrones, take off their crowns, and proceeding to the altar, kneel before it. The King offers the bread and wine for the service, and an ingot or wedge of gold of a pound weight. The Queen offers an altar-cloth and a wedge of a mark weight, all of which the Archbishop receives and lays upon the altar. The Communion service is then read. At its conclusion, their majesties resume their crowns and proceed to the chapel, where the imperial mantles are laid aside, and the various parts of the regalia are given to the persons whose duty it is to receive them. The King and Queen are robed in purple velvet, and returning to the nave of the Abbey leave the building by the door at which they entered, and the long ceremony is ended.

Beacons in the Lighthouse

WITHOUT its gleaming signal to shine through the darkness and storm, a lighthouse would be a useless affair. It might even be worse than useless and become a serious menace to navigators. But with its clear lamp casting a steady line of light along the waters, it is a blessing and a safeguard to the mariner. By its white ray, he can see where lie the cruel rocks and where the breakers dash angrily upon the hidden ledges, and with due skill and care he can avoid them. But for the lighthouse, with its eye of flame, watching o'er the waters, thousands would perish, who now come home safely and joyously when their voyage is ended.

In that stormy strait of sin—the Bowery of New York—the old Gospel Lighthouse of the Bowery Mission has been casting its ray of kindly invitation out to the moral shipwrecks and the destitute for nearly a quarter of a century. Never, in that time, has its beacon-light been permitted to die out. In the ancient temples of Greece and Rome, there were certain shrines kept perpetually lighted. Those were the offerings of superstitious and heathen races. But the illumination that streams from the old Lighthouse on the Bowery is the lamp of Gospel invitation, calling the wanderers, not to heathen rites or mystical invocations, but to the only haven of safety and peace for sin-sick souls, at the foot of the Cross.

In recent months, great accessions have been made to the work of the Bowery Mission. The Lighthouse League—that band of godly men and women in many States, who have aided by their prayers and their gifts in keeping the light burning brightly—has expanded from a very little company to the magnitude of a legion of splendid Christian workers, each and all laboring earnestly in their own immediate fields, as well as loyally standing by the parent organization. We believe it is intended that the Lighthouse League shall yet be instrumental in doing a great Christian work throughout the land—a work carried on in a homely and simple way, yet one that cannot fail to bring deep and enduring satisfaction. We commend it to all who wish to have share in this simple heart service. There is no community, however small, that would not be bettered, morally and spiritually, by the presence and example of a branch of the League, whose members, each in his or her own special sphere, and all together, can work with enthusiasm and efficiency, in the Master's name, in a thousand different ways.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will furnish free, on application, printed instructions to those who desire to apply for membership and to organize Home Leagues.

Paste-Diamond Religion

EASY it is for man to be wicked, but it is hard for him to be good, to be holy. You can mold a false diamond in paste or glass in a few minutes, but nature requires ages of patient workmanship to crystallize the real diamond from the dark charcoal. You can cover common pine wood with an exquisitely grained veneer of walnut or mahogany at small expense and with little effort, but the grain of the walnut or mahogany represents many years of strain and struggle, during which the tree grew its beautiful markings.

So, in the human world we can make imitations of moral and spiritual qualities, while the genuine can only be produced by a patient process of self-discipline, by many prayers and tears and toils.

The paste diamond of religion that glitters brightly enough to deceive many, can be manufactured in the mold of easy compliance with outward church duties and ordinances; the veneer of godliness can be assumed by a profession which costs nothing, and makes no demand of self-sacrifice upon the inner nature. But the freedom from the power of sin, and the likeness to God which full salvation means can only be ours through cross-bearing daily while we live, following in the footsteps of Him who was made perfect through suffering. So long as it is a slain lamb that sits upon the throne of heaven, so long will labor and pain and self-sacrifice be the root and the fruit of all life that is worthy of the name.

The Drift of the Times

PESSIMISTIC Christians, who are depressed by the present tendencies of the churches, may find consolation and encouragement in the recent utterances of the Chairman of the British Congregational Union. They have a greater significance from the fact that they were dictated on a bed of sickness; and when they were read to the Union, their author, Dr. Caleb Scott, was very near the eternal world. Under such circumstances, the sense of responsibility is keenly felt, and the impressiveness which attaches always to the words of the elected representative of an influential denomination, receives added emphasis. In Great Britain, as in this country, many members of churches have been alarmed at the tendency of the younger ministers to discriminate between the divine and the human elements in the Bible. They have observed with a feeling of apprehension how the preachers dwell on the characteristics of the authors of the various books in the inspired volume, and find in those characteristics an explanation of passages which have perplexed devout readers of the Bible. They have been shocked at hearing from the pulpit the assertion that the authors, for example, of the imprecatory Psalms, were uttering their own thoughts and giving expression to their own indignation when they wrote, rather than to the loving and magnanimous Spirit of God. To the venerable Christian who has been taught to regard every word between the covers of the sacred Book as dictated by the Holy Spirit, such a mode of dealing with it appears irreverent, and there has arisen a fear, lest under such guidance the churches might eventually be led to abandon the doctrine of inspiration, on which the Protestant faith rests.

To such distressed Christians, Dr. Scott especially addresses himself. He expresses the belief that in spite of the mischief that irreverent criticism has done, the church has benefited by the light shed on the Bible by the studies connected with the movement. He has no fear for the future from the critics. He believes there never was a time when reverence for Christ as "the Word made flesh" was more firmly and generally held than now. Storm-clouds had gathered around that sacred head, but it had waxed more luminous with loving affection and grateful loyalty. The thoughts of Christians generally had been centred less and less on secondary matters, and more on him who was the common Head of all. So long as this tendency continued, there was no ground for apprehension, but we might safely trust in Christ's promise that the Spirit of truth should be with his church, leading it into all truth.

It is gratifying to find this eminent servant of Christ so strong in his faith. If one who has so excellent an opportunity of gauging the spirit of the churches takes a roseate view of the future, in spite of the danger, we may well take heart with him, believing that the Divine Head of the Church will guide it and care for it in the years to come, as he has done in the years gone by, and that no storms will be permitted to drive it from its anchorage.

LIFE AND WORK OF DR. TALMAGE

SEND IN YOUR ORDER AT ONCE AND MAKE SURE OF A COPY

A Great Book on a Great Subject

THE editors, compositors, artists, engravers, electrotypers, printers and bookbinders engaged on that great volume, for which tens of thousands have been impatiently waiting, entitled THE LIFE AND WORK OF T. DE WITT TALMAGE, have at last completed their labors. Now the packers, the shippers, the Post-offices, and the various express companies are busy rushing forward to their destination the copies which were ordered before date of publication, while from thousands of sources in the United States and foreign countries orders continue to pour in, so that before long the first enormous edition of this superb work will have been completely exhausted.

The Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage, the talented son of his illustrious father, speaking of this work in the Introduction, written by himself, says:

Asked to write an introduction to this biographical edition, I comply gladly. The editors of this book have known my father intimately, and two of them have been identified with him for many years, as editorial associates, on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They not only worked with but they loved my father. Nothing has gone into this book except the material they personally have furnished or passed upon. Theirs has been a task of love.

The public and private life of a great man can never be entirely separated. If we love to read the sermons which Doctor Talmage preached, we also want to peep into the study where they were written. We want to see the farmhouse where once played the boy who afterwards became the greatest preacher of his day. We want to find out the characteristics which made his wonderful career possible. All these facts can be found upon the written pages of this volume.

This magnificent volume, beautifully printed, profusely illustrated and elaborately bound, containing 500 large pages illustrated with over 150 pertinent engravings, covers nearly every phase of Dr. Talmage's distinguished career, and no admirer of Dr. Talmage should fail to secure a copy of this superb work, and learn from its pages the wonderful life-story of the man whose voice and pen charmed the civilized world, and who commanded greater audiences than any other man that ever lived.

Although the volume weighs over three pounds, we prepay postage or expressage in every instance. Facing the Title Page is a superb picture of Dr. Talmage, one of the best, if not the very best, ever taken of him. It is a full-page picture, and represents Dr. Talmage seated at a desk with pen in hand, ready either for editorial or sermonic work. This volume is edited by Rev. Louis Albert Banks, D.D., in conjunction with Dr. B. J. Fernie and George H. Sandison, Ph.D., Associate Editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who, during the last twelve years of Dr. Talmage's life sustained the most confidential and cordial relations with the world's greatest preacher.

Among the pictures contained in this exquisite memorial volume, may be mentioned a Baptism by Dr. Talmage in the Jordan; Preaching on Mars' Hill; Dr. Talmage in St. Petersburg conversing with the Czar, Dr. Talmage Addressing a Huge Multitude in the City of Edinburgh; Dr. Talmage in the Brooklyn Tabernacle Pulpit; Dr. Talmage at Athens; Dr. Talmage Addressing an Audience of 30,000, at Hyde Park, London; Scene at a Banquet given Dr. Talmage at the Crystal Palace, London; Dr. Talmage in India; Descent into a Coal Mine; Dr. Talmage in Australia; Dr. Talmage Addressing a Monster Meeting at John Wesley's Church in London, and 140 others equally interesting.

No other book issued within the last few years can excel this in intense, living interest, not only for the time being, but for all time to come. It will be as fresh, as interesting, as helpful, and as inspiring ten years hence as it is at the present time. It is born to live, as the memory of Dr. Talmage will live in the hearts of an affectionate people many, many years yet to come.

SEND TWO DOLLARS and we will express, all charges prepaid, a copy of The Life and Work of Dr. Talmage, with an introduction by his son, Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, D.D., bound in silk-finished cloth, with emblematic design in colors and gilt. Address,

Ancient Relics

EFFORTS to understand and reconstruct remote periods of history have, during the past year, been unusually fruitful of results. They have been carried on in widely separated lands, and with the newer spirit of investigation, have been made by delving in the earth rather than by searching in books. The spade of the explorer has been busy, while the archaeologist eagerly watched the uncovering of buildings long buried, and the recovery of relics long lost. Among the strange finds that have been made is one of a sculptured slab which was dug up in the city of Mexico recently. It represents a head and face of a type evidently common in that land in a far distant period, but not found in the times of which any record remains. The features are clearly Mongolian, and the eyes almond-shaped, plainly implying that people from far-eastern Asia once had their home in the land of the Montezumas. Another interesting slab was dug up in Scotland lately. It bears the figure of a Roman soldier in full armor with a short sword in his hand. Antiquarians believe it has been buried for nearly twenty centuries. A still more interesting discovery has been made in Rome. The temple of Jupiter Stator, of which no trace had been found, has been uncovered from great masses of later ruins, and the site of the wondrous pile described by ancient historians, has been identified by the prostrate columns and huge stones lying around. But the discovery which excites the most intense curiosity is of a skeleton which is believed to be that of the elder Pliny. It was found near the house of his friend Pompeianus at Pompeii. It is known that Pliny landed at Pompeii to witness the eruption of Vesuvius in the year 79 A.D., and that he was never seen afterwards. His nephew always believed he had perished under the shower of ashes which overwhelmed the city. The explorers, digging through the lava which has covered the region for more than eighteen centuries, uncovered the house of Pompeianus, which Pliny would be likely to visit. Near it they found the skeletons of a number of persons, who, by their dress, were evidently servants. With them were other skeletons of patricians. One of these occupying the place of honor, whose skull indicated superior intelligence, is thought to have been that of Pliny. A gold chain was still about its neck, a ring on the skeleton finger and a sword by its side. It is conjectured that he was aiding his friend to remove the valuables from his house when the whole party was overwhelmed. The relics are full of interest to antiquarians, but they teach other lessons, too often overlooked, of the reasons for the passing away of human greatness and of human achievements, which the ancient prophets so emphatically taught:

The generation to come of your children that shall rise up after you, and the stranger that shall come from a far land, shall say, when they see the plagues of that land, like the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? (Deut. 29: 22).

A Memorable Invitation

A New York merchant, traveling recently in the West, met with a grateful acquaintance during his trip. A substantial-looking man looked narrowly at him as he sat in the parlor of the hotel, and then went to the office and consulted the register. He returned, and asked the New York man if he had ever been superintendent of a Sunday School in Pennsylvania. "Yes," was the reply, "I once had charge of a school at Lock Haven." The stranger grasped his hand and hailed him as an old friend. "You were the first man," he said, "who did me a kindness. I was a poor, hungry boy thirty years ago, buffed and kicked by everyone. But one day you came to the town with your school for a picnic. I stood and looked enviously at the children, wishing I, too, could have such fun. I was ragged and dirty, but you spoke kindly to me, and asked me to come with you. I was surprised to have any one speak to me like that, but I went and had a good time. From that time I braced up, and tried to be a good boy. It was the turning-point in my life. I am a rich man now. I own two saw-mills and other property. I have built a church and paid for it, and I am superintendent of the Sunday School. I would like you to come to my home. I owe it all to your kindness that day." Such testimony, we may be sure, was exceedingly gratifying to the merchant, making him very thankful that he had done that long-forgotten act of kindness.

As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men (Gal. 6: 10).

Thirty Years a Hermit

A pathetic story was told last week in a rural court near Sleepy Hollow, N. Y. An appeal had been made to have an aged man living in a broken-down house in the woods in the township of Ardsley, declared incapable of managing his affairs. He strenuously resisted the application, and though he showed great agitation, appeared to have full use of his faculties. It appears that more than thirty years ago he was married to the daughter of a wealthy farmer of Dobbs Ferry, N. Y. The wedding was a general festival, to which a host of friends of both families were invited. They came from long distances, and the festivities were prolonged. When, at last, the bride and bridegroom set out on horseback for their new home, they were accompanied by their friends as far as the ford where they were to cross the river. In some way the bride's horse stumbled in crossing; she was thrown off, and before anyone could rescue her, she was drowned. Her husband, who had loved her passionately, was heartbroken. He went to the home he had prepared for her, locked up the rooms they were to have occupied, and boarded up the joining properties. It is triangular in shape, and by actual survey is forty square inches. The purchaser has planned to use it as the head of a stairway which will lead down to a subterranean vault, which he proposes to construct under the sidewalk. He believes that though he paid five dollars an inch for it, he will get a good return on his investment. The price he paid shows how high an estimate of value may be put on a small part of the earth's surface, yet the time is coming when the largest landed estate will be accounted a thing of no worth in comparison with a title to a home in the heavenly mansions.

For the world passeth away and the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever (I. John 2: 17).

The Cost of an Appeal

A prisoner in a Massachusetts town is lamenting his indiscretion in appealing from the decision of a police court justice. He was charged with intoxication and was fined five dollars. As he was unable to pay, he was committed to prison for the usual term of five days. He was persuaded to appeal against the sentence, but as he was a stranger in the town and unable to furnish bail, he was held until his appeal could be heard. Finding that he would have to remain in prison for more than five days, he elected to accept the original sentence and withdrew his appeal. But the appeal had involved additional court charges, which brought the case under another category in which sums above five dollars are dealt with. The penalty in those cases is twenty days' imprisonment, and as the man had made an appeal which the court deemed frivolous, the full penalty was imposed. He has therefore been held twenty days, instead of the five which would have satisfied the court had he been willing to submit to his first sentence. He is learning the lesson that many are very slow to learn in their dealing with God. It is only when men cease to make excuses for themselves and acknowledge their guilt, and that God would be just in punishing them, that they find rest and peace in Christ:

Thou sayest, because I am innocent, surely his anger shall turn from me: behold, I will enter into judgment with thee, because thou sayest, I have not sinned (Jer 2: 35).

A Conference on Prophecy will be held at Dallas, Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, June 24-29. Among the speakers who have promised to take part are Rev. A. C. Gaebelein, Geo. L. Aldrich, F. C. Jennings and John M. Carnie.

A large party of Polish and German Jews, mostly agricultural laborers, passed through Geneva last week on their way home from Jerusalem. "Our experiment has failed," said the patriarch among them. "The soil around Jerusalem is very poor, and yields only a scanty crop."

Rev. W. J. Heywood, Methodist missionary in China, says that the results of his ten years' labor in the Ningpo district have been most gratifying. Ten years since, they had five chapels, now they have twelve; in those years also the 27 stations had grown to 122, and 900 members and inquirers to 2,500.

The religious colleges in the United States are thus summarized by the Independent: 105 Baptist colleges and universities, 66 Methodist, 44 Congregational and 39 Presbyterian; 61 Roman Catholic colleges, all for men; 24 Lutheran colleges, 15 Disciples, 9 United Brethren and 7 Protestant Episcopal.

The Students' Conference at Northfield will begin June 27 and continue until July 6, under the leadership of John R. Mott. Robert E. Speer, Prof. E. I. Fosburg, Prof. H. C. King, Rev. J. C. Morgan, Rev. John Kelman, Rev. C. W. Gordon, and Dr. Woodrow Wilson are the speakers. The General Conference of Christian Workers will begin August 1 and continue till the 17th, inclusive.

Gospel services are being held every evening in the week in the tent at Broadway and Fifty-sixth street, New York, at eight o'clock. On Sundays, there is also a service at four o'clock. They are undenominational, and the Superintendent, Rev. S. Hartwell Pratt, is assisted by an advisory committee of ministers of various denominations. Subscriptions in aid of the work may be sent to Mr. Harvey D. Blakeslee, 31 Nassau street, New York.

At Silver Bay, Lake George, in northern New York, will be held, June 27 to July 15, a conference for young women who desire training in Bible study and methods of Christian work. The work of the Young Women's Christian Associations of the East and in Canada will be studied. Special attention will be given to home and foreign missions, and the conducting of young people's societies. Further particulars may be obtained by addressing Miss T. F. Hall, 1312 Champlain Building, Chicago, Ill.

windows. During the thirty years that have since elapsed, he has permitted no one to enter the house. He has lived there absolutely alone, and except for his appearance at the country store at long intervals, to purchase supplies, no one has seen him. He has grown more and more eccentric with the passage of years, until his friends deemed it wise, for his own sake, that he should be taken care of. They found the walls of his dwelling covered with charcoal portraits of his dead wife, whom he had mourned so faithfully for so many years. How many bereaved people have been tempted to act in a similar way! But it is a foolish weakness thus to throw away the remainder of life in rebellion against the will of God. It was a better spirit that the sorrowing king showed when his beloved child died.

Now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me (II. Samuel 12: 23).

A Miniature Property

A deed registered in New York last week records the smallest property held by any citizen. It has a six inch frontage on Third avenue and fourteen inches on the cross street. The purchaser paid two hundred dollars for the plot. At the same rate, the cost of land for an ordinary dwelling would be a million and a half dollars. The original owners of the land tried to sell it, with the remainder of their holdings, some years ago, but the city authorities, who needed the land for widening the cross-street, would not buy an inch more than they needed, so this little gore was left between the ad-

Salvation Army's Birthday Festival

REPRESENTATIVES FROM EVERY QUARTER OF OUR CONTINENT IN ATTENDANCE

AT the Pan-American Congress, in which the Salvation Army celebrated its twenty-second anniversary, May 27, in Carnegie Music Hall, New York, a record of wonderful growth in the organization itself and of marvelous accomplishment of good works was unfolded. Soldiers from almost every quarter of the continent were present; and some had come from over sea. The headquarters on Fourteenth street fairly overflowed with men and women wearing Salvation Army red and blue. National Staff Councils were in session every day for a week before the anniversary event of the Jubilee at Carnegie Hall. The great stone barracks rang from morning till night with the clash of cymbals, beat of drums, sound of cornet, singing of Gospel hymns, voice of encouragement and admonition and voice of prayer.

Special meetings were not limited to headquarters, however. Every Salvation Army centre in the city felt the stirring impulse of the occasion. On Sunday, May 25, the Academy of Music, East Fourteenth street, was crowded with listeners to Consul Booth-Tucker's illustrated lecture, "Love and Sorrow." At night, a regular revival meeting filled the same place, and the novel spectacle was presented of a long array of penitents going right up to the footlights of this theatre, and kneeling there for prayer.

Reports made at the councils show that the number of new barracks built during the past year is far above the average annual increase. "The number of conversions," said Brigadier Cox, editor of the War Cry, "is startling, even to the Salvation Army, which is used to big numbers in this direction. More converts have become soldiers than ever before. More children are coming under Army influence, and we have now a thoroughly-organized Sunday School system." Commander Booth-Tucker, in his address before Mayor Low, at City Hall, where he and the Consul called, at the head of a delegation representing some 900 centres of Salvation Army activity, and 2,900 officers and employees in this country, gives in a few words the status of the sociologic work of the Army:

Our various institutions, all non-sectarian, provide sleeping accommodation for more than nine thousand of the needy, on whose behalf more than $300,000 were expended during last year. Worthy families have been transplanted from this and other cities to our farm colonies, and have there been enabled to become self-supporting home-owners. Our fifty industrial homes have found temporary employment for thousands out of work, until permanent situations could be obtained. One of the most successful of these homes has been operating for about two years in Brooklyn.

The Mayor's reception was gracious and encouraging. He knew, he said, the value of Salvation Army work in the slums. The outdoor parade on May 22 was an interesting object-lesson and attracted much attention on the streets. On wagons decorated with Army colors, men and women were busy demonstrating features of Army industries—the Salvage Department sorting rags, girls from the Rescue Home binding books, etc.

The features of the programme of the Carnegie Hall meeting, after the special address by Commander Booth-Tucker, were the ordination of forty men and women students for Home Missions; building the "Rock of Ages" on the platform, by Army children in international costume, and "Trooping of Colors," demonstrating Army operations here and abroad, and Consul Booth-Tucker's address on "Woman's Place and Work in the World." The "Ordination" was very impressive, and the "Trooping of Colors" a most beautiful and effective tableau.

Announcement has been made that General Booth will visit America this autumn. This promise came with his congratulations and wishes for many happy returns to the Army in America, on its celebration of the great "Birthday Rally."

RECOLLECTIONS OF ST. PIERRE AND ITS PEOPLE

READERS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have, by eye-witnesses and scientists, been so well informed of the most horrible events which have utterly destroyed the city of St. Pierre and its surroundings, and which, even at this moment, seem to menace the city of Fort de France, that it is by far better now to leave it to scientists to write about the catastrophe itself. Let us hope that the island of Martinique may not be doomed; for it would be greatly deplored if that little paradise should disappear from the map of the world.

St. Pierre, small as it was, was divided into the business district, consisting of two streets, the residential and the workingmen's districts, all of which were very narrow, and the whole city was so situated up the hill from the coast that one street seemed to lie above the other, and they appeared like terraces. The houses in the residential part were surrounded by small, nicely laid-out gardens. The town itself was terribly hot throughout the entire year, Mont Pelee preventing the land breeze from reaching the city, and as soon as the sea-breeze died out, an almost suffocating temperature prevailed. Although there were excellent water-works, little was done for the comfort of the population, and only in a limited number of houses could baths be found.

That the most luxurious comfort was possible in St. Pierre, however, was proven by the "Club of the Whites," which was furnished splendidly. This "Club of the Whites" (Cercle des Blancs), was only a nickname (like "Club of the Colored," as the "Cercle de l'Union" was called). These names are characteristic of the general feeling in St. Pierre. In no other island of the West Indian group was the equality of the two races so loudly proclaimed as in Martinique, and in no other island did the hatred between white and colored population make itself so very conspicuous. The race antagonism was felt not only in politics, but in social life. The whites had no social intercourse with the colored. This was the more disagreeable for the stranger, who might easily get on bad terms with one class if he associated with the other. Amongst the colored population of St. Pierre, however, it should be stated, there were many extremely intelligent people, whose family life was quite ideal. Indeed, the whole population was extremely amiable, accommodating and hospitable, qualities that are always found where French education is combined with tropical temperament. While the amusements of the whites consisted in social gatherings at the club and attending the festivities arranged there, the colored formed singing and musical societies, under the leadership of professional musicians, which gave excellent performances. However, the main amusements were found by the people in their own family life. In this connection a statement must be denied, which lately has been made in various newspapers and periodicals, that St. Pierre was terribly immoral! Whoever is familiar with the influence of tropical climates on human nature, could not find in Martinique anything to deserve so sweeping a condemnation. A similar misapprehension prevails in regard to the drinking habit in St. Pierre. In Martinique large quantities of rum are manufactured for export, and St. Pierre was the shipping point; but very little was consumed there, and rarely could a drunken man be met in the streets. The greatest drawback was an extraordinarily strong superstition.

Mont Pelee was not only considered above suspicion of danger, but was a popular place for recreation and amusement. Villages were built in cool shady spots from the end of the large park, which was situated on the outskirts of St. Pierre, almost up to the summit. It was worth while to travel to the island if only for the sake of seeing this park. It was a botanic garden, containing nearly every plant growing in the tropical zone, and the grounds laid as though nature itself without human aid had been the landscape gardener.

Morne Rouge, the summer resort, was reached by a comfortable, shady driveway connecting the city with the summit of the mountain ("Morne" is the Creole word for "mountain"). The place was always cool, and there well-to-do families of St. Pierre had their summer residences. Vegetables and fruits of the moderate zone grew there, and as the place could be reached from St. Pierre in a few hours, merchants could, during the day, attend to their business in the city and spend the night with their families in the cool retreat.

The colored population of the entire island contains a large percentage of mulattoes, mostly handsome people, elastic carriage, who combine natural gracefulness with French chic. The white inhabitants of St. Pierre were mostly descendants of old noble French families, who were proud of their more or less authentic relations with the Empress Josephine, and who had preserved the old French chivalry in their movements and in their expressions and language. There was a real "Josephine cult," in almost every house one could find pictures or statuettes of the dearly-beloved Empress; but all those, together with their owners, are now buried under the lava of Mont Pelee. WHY Some Men Succeed and Others FAIL

THE FIRST OF A SERIES OF ARTICLES SPECIALLY WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BY DR. ORISON SWETT MARDEN

IN 1802, Richard Trevethick constructed a steam carriage that greatly excited the curiosity of Cornwall, England, and ran without difficulty to Plymouth. In 1804, he completed a tramway engine which, when tested on the Merthyr Tydvil Railway, in Wales, dragged after it, at the rate of five miles an hour, several wagons loaded with ten tons each of bar iron. But when it was found that the engine was not well adapted for regular working, Trevethick only said, "The world always goes wrong with me," and abandoned his invention for another idea which seemed to promise well at first, but which he never fully developed. He changed from one thing to another until he at length became completely discouraged, and died without accomplishing anything worthy of his undoubted great ability. Had he possessed half the persistence of James Watt, or the practicability of George Stephenson, he would have been little less famous than they in the annals of steam development.

MANY YEARS ago two farmer boys attended the same country school in Ohio. One was a "smart" boy, who got his lessons easily, and was a favorite, whose future was thought to be bright. The other was slow to learn, and was called dull. No one predicted that he would amount to anything. The dull boy, by quickly seizing an opportunity, secured an appointment to West Point, graduated by hard study, went West, engaged in business, went out of business at his country's call, and, after many ups and downs, entered the White House as President Grant. The "bright boy" did not go to West Point. He did not go anywhere, or do anything, beyond making a poor living on a neighboring farm.

FORTY YEARS ago, a stable-boy cleaned the horses of a prosperous hotel proprietor, who drove into Denver for supplies. Now that boy is Governor Orman, of Colorado, and the hotel-keeper, with shattered fortunes, is glad to accept a place as watchman of a capitol corridor, at the hand of the former stable-boy. Life is made up of such contrasts. Every successful man, in whatever degree and in whatever line, has, at every step of his life, been on seemingly equal terms with hundreds of his fellows who, later, reached no such measure of success as he. Every miserable failure has had at some time as many chances, and at least as much possibility of cultivating the same qualities as the successful people have had at some time in their lives.

CERTAIN ELEMENTS that make for success or failure are inherent in the person, or dependent wholly on exterior circumstances. Helen Keller and Theodore Roosevelt had at birth very different problems to face to gain cultured maturity. Phil Sheridan, son of a poor Irish laborer, and Frederick Dent Grant, son of a great general, stood varying chances of going to West Point or winning military distinction. Frederick Funston, botanical explorer and newspaper reporter, had quite another road to travel to a generalship. Juhan Hawthorne, son of a popular author, and accustomed to a literary atmosphere all his boyhood, was more likely to become a writer than Paul Dunbar, a colored youth, with most ordinary surroundings. The Russian peasant boy, Gorky, had less chance still than Dunbar, who, at least, was schooled and lived in a land where circumstances favor rising.

ENVIRONMENT HAS its part in molding every person's life, but biography proves that no environment can absolutely prevent success, or even limit it very definitely to any particular line. Find the Right Groove The candidate changes grooves when he finds himself in the wrong groove. This judgment of when and how to change the direction of one's efforts is one of the most striking features of many successful lives. Many a business man has made his fortune by promptly deciding at some nice juncture to expose himself to a considerable risk. Yet many failures are caused by ill-advised changes and causeless vacillation of purpose. The vacillating man, however strong in other respects, is always pushed aside in the race of life by the determined man, the decisive man, who knows what he wants to do, and does it; even brains must give way to decision. One could almost say that no life ever failed that was steadfastly devoted to one aim, if that aim were not in itself unworthy.

THE PLACE of birth and raising has much to do with how you must win success, but really very little with the possibility of your success. Cabin-born Lincoln won a greater success than Poverty not a Barrier any infant born with a silver spoon in its mouth, and cradled in luxury. Booker T. Washington's early environment could not keep him from success in a line that seemed utterly impossible to anyone who saw the little slave boy. Sawing wood, treading clay in a brick-yard, and working on a farm served Roswell P. Flower as an apprenticeship for a leadership in finance and politics, and Benjamin B. Odell found delivering ice just as good a preparation for the chair of Governor of New York. Neither the village of Morayshire, Scotland, nor the bleak shores of

REVIEW.

1. How is the termination -tion expressed? 2. How is the -tion hook written after a curve? 3. How is the -tion hook written after a straight consonant? 4. How after a straight letter beginning with a hook, circle, or loop, or springing from f, v, or upward l? 5. How is the -tion hook written after t, d, or j? 6. Give examples of the -tion hook used medially. 7. How is -tion expressed when following the circle s or ss? 8. How far can this hook be vocalized? 9. How is -tion written when two vowel signs occur immediately before it? Write accentuation.

Additional Double Consonants

112. In addition to the general method of doubling consonants by the use of hooks, the following eight double consonants are represented as shown below:

| Letters | Sign | Name | As in |
|---------|----------|----------|----------------|
| KW | ⌞ | kway | quick, request |
| GW | ⌞ | gway | guava, anguish |
| WL | ⌞ (up) | wel | weal, unwell |
| WHL | ⌞ (up) | whel | whale, whelp |
| LR | ⌞ (down) | ler | feeler, nailer |
| RR | ⌞ (down) | rer | poorer, sharer |
| MP, MB | ⌞ | emp, emb | camp, embalm |
| WH | ⌞ | whay | where, whig |

113. The initial hook in wl and whl is read FIRST; thus, will, willie, willow, whale, Whale. If a vowel precedes w or wh, write the stroke and not the hook, thus awhile.

114. The remaining six characters are vocalized like the single consonants; thus, calm, qualm, squammish; keen, queen; gulf, Gulph; fowl, fowler; kneel, kneeler.

bear, beaver, jeer, jeerer; tram, tramp, mire, empire; way, whey; weasel, whistle.

115. The double consonants LR and RR are employed only to indicate the terminations ler and rer; separate letters must be written when another vowel occurs in the termination, or when a vowel follows; thus, foiler, failure; railer, railery; fairer, furor; usurer, orrery.

116. The double consonant mp with a small initial hook becomes mpr or mbr; thus, scamp, scamper, clamber, limber.

How the Decalogue Forbids Drink

QUARTERLY

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JUNE 22
ROM. 13: 8-14

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—"LET US THEREFORE CAST OFF THE WORKS OF DARKNESS, AND LET US PUT ON THE ARMOR OF LIGHT." ROM. 13: 2

ONE of the eight commandments of Buddha forbids the use of intoxicants. This and like rules of Hinduism and Mohammedanism have protected half of the human race against the drink curse, and furnished to heathen religions their one conspicuous virtue. These religions enforce prohibition better than it is enforced in some prohibitory parts of Christian nations, and they observe their total abstinence rule better than the ethical rules of our own churches are observed by some Christians. Drink has somewhat invaded these total abstinence religions, chiefly among those classes that have been influenced by the white man's evil example. The seven hundred millions who abstain in loyalty to their commandments afford seven hundred million arguments against the popular fallacy that there is in all human beings a natural craving for intoxicants.

Many a Christian temperance man, no doubt, has secretly wished that total abstinence and prohibition had been one of our Ten Commandments. But is not drink forbidden by the Decalogue, fairly interpreted? If so, why was it not more specifically forbidden? Here are questions that should make lively discussion in any wide-awake Sunday School class.

A prominent preacher in one of the evangelical denominations that allows whiskey distillers to be church members, and even elects them to trusteeships, on being reminded that his church courts were more ready to resolve in behalf of the Sabbath than of temperance, replied, "Oh, yes; Sabbath observance is in the Commandments." It reminded us of the rural justice of the peace who dismissed a man accused of stealing gooseberries, because he could not find anything about gooseberries in his law book.

This temperance lesson finds the law against drink where the Christian world has found the law against slavery, in the second table of the Decalogue, whose essence is love to man. Temperance is a part of this law of right human relations, not a solitary virtue, but one apartment in the happy palace of brotherly virtues that is built on the second table of the law.

Owe no man anything, but to love one another.—One is tempted to linger on the drink habit as the prolific mother of bad debts. The grocer must charge all sober men an extra price to cover the uncollectable debts of men who spend money they owe for the comforts of life in buying the curses the saloon has to sell. Charitable people must pay the rent bill, because the drunken father put the money he owed his landlord into the rum-sellers' till.

But this opening verse of the lesson has a greater thought. One debt we all owe, even to unworthy neighbors, the debt of brotherly love, which we must pay in daily installments, and can never fully settle up. The best way to pay this love is not always in charity poured out upon those whose poverty is due to vice. In charity, as elsewhere, prevention is better than cure, and preventive charity is reform, which cuts the vicious roots of poverty. That man loves the drunkard wisely who removes the temptations he is too weak to withstand. And he loves best of all who saves him when a boy, before he begins to drink, by total abstinence and prohibition.

Drink is offered in the name of friendship, but no man truly loves his neighbor who helps to put on him the drink habit and its consequences.

He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law.—Here, again, we find the love basis of all law, including temperance laws. Children of all ages think of law as willful restraint of liberty. But all true laws, divine and human, are love's warnings "for our good always." Law is the red lantern to keep us out of danger, and show us the only safe way. And this is pre-eminently true of all temperance laws.

The broad pedestal of total abstinence and prohibition is shown all through this lesson to be the second table of the law, which Moses and Jesus both condensed into the one great command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." One church wisely gathers its members for moral studies under the name of "The Right Relationship League." The saloon breaks up every right relation, honesty, industry, kindness, alike in the home and on the street, in business and politics and pleasure.

Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not bear false witness. Thou shalt not covet.—There is a legend that the devil, having a man in his power, offered him his choice whether he would be a drunkard or break all of the commandments. He chose to be a drunkard, but the result was that he soon broke all of the commandments also. Drink makes men atheists and anarchists. And whoever heard of a drunkard who was not profane and a Sabbath breaker? Or of one who did not dishonor his parents? Few murders are done by sober men. It is in saloons that thieves make their plots, and it is there they develop the poverty that often prompts to robbery. Adultery is the saloon's daily bread. Covetousness is its unseen motor. Investigations made by the Massachusetts Bureau of Labor have shown that three-fourths of the crime is done by men strongly addicted to drink, and in most cases when under its influence.

Love worketh no ill to his neighbor.—Imagine that motto painted over a saloon door, or even hung as a motto over a private sideboard. Let it be written at the top of the petition for license which professing Christians are about to sign. Put it over the ballot box where thoughtless good men are about to license saloons by their votes.

It is high time to awake out of sleep.—For the most part, men only awake when the saloon has kidnapped some member of the household. They are not aroused when the father or son or daughter of a neighbor goes over the rapids of drink. It is proverbial that many, if not most, of the temperance workers have been awakened by the invasion of their own homes by the drink evil. What folly is this to leave the door unlocked until, not "the horse," but the hope of the household has been stolen! When some unknown man or woman is reported murdered, hundreds of letters from broken hearts pour in on the police, saying: "Send description. Perhaps it is our long lost one."

Let us put off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light.—One bitter winter night the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse had taken a cab from a London suburb, and on reaching home bade the driver come in and get something warm and

He had put off the works of darkness and had put on the armor of light. The figure suggests that though revelry assumes to be joy and counts goodness as tame, wickedness is really "darkness," not alone in that it is wickedness, but also in that it is really unhappiness; while goodness is "light" in the sense of joy, as well as of right. As we write, the news comes that a skilled workman, to whom Mr. Schwab, of the Steel Trust, a year ago promised $100 if he would abstain for a year, having kept his pledge, has received $200 instead. This is but a suggestion of what abstinence does indirectly for all who practice it, increasing their gains and so their means of happiness. Here it is appropriate to quote Andrew Carnegie's words to young men in his new book, The Empire of Business. He says to them: "You are more likely to fail in your career from acquiring the habit of drinking liquor than from any or all the other temptations likely to assail you."

Although intemperance is the chief vice it is not the only one, and it is in Bible passages, as in real life, seen as the chief of an evil clan, including impurity, gambling and Sabbath-breaking, and therefore, it seems to us, the whole group should be attacked as in the W. C. T. U. plan, rather than singling out one of the tribe for attack on the one-idea plan that was formerly common and is not yet wholly given up.

Let us walk honestly as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness. . . . But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ.—These are the words that flashed as a red light, swung by God's own hand before Augustine, when, as a young man, he was tramping on the prayers of his Christian mother in a life of dissipation. Aroused to a sense of his sin against God and his mother when his eye fell upon these words, he put off the filthy rags of his old life and put on Christ.

Two Americans sat in a gambling den in Hong Kong, China, several years ago. The younger man, while waiting for the other to shuffle the cards, carelessly sang a verse of Phebe Carey's hymn, "One Sweetly Solemn Thought." His companion gazed at him with surprise, and exclaimed: "Where did you learn that?" The young man replied: "In a Sunday School in America." Then old memories rushed like a flood tide to the old man, who, with tear-dimmed eyes repeated the whole poem. Dashing the cards on the floor, he said: "Come, Harry; here's what I've won from you; go and use it for a good purpose. As for me, as God sees me, I have played my last game, and drunk my last bottle. I have misled you, Harry, and am sorry. Give me your hand, my boy, and say, for old America's sake, if for no other, you will quit this business." The two men returned to America, and led new lives.

Let us open our Bibles and find out the meaning of the picture of St. Michael triumphing over the dragon, by Guido, which is reproduced on this page.

A great artist, by the name of Guido Reni, who lived more than four hundred years ago read in the Bible Revelation 20: 13, and determined to paint a picture. He mixed wonderful colors, and made perhaps the most beautiful angel that ever was painted. Notice his outspread wings.

Let us try to be painters now, and make this picture over. Let us take Satan for the whole liquor business. It puts people into poor-houses, and lunatic asylums, and hospitals, and prisons. It puts little children into homes for the friendless, and into orphan asylums, when, if it were not for the drink, they would have comfortable, sweet homes of their own. The liquor business is Satan himself. It is a monster of great age, for we read in the Bible that Lot was made drunk, and he lived about two thousand years before Jesus was born.

And who is the good angel that is determined upon chaining this terrible enemy of mankind? His name is Temperance Reform. What strong, lusty youth he is! He was born in 1836, so you see he is not even one hundred years old yet, when the enemy he is fighting is fully for thousand years old! I say this Temperance youth was born in 1836, because it was then decided by the people who were fighting the giant "Drink" that total abstinence must be the way cry in the temperance fight.

It is now possible for any State to have "legislative prohibition," that is, any State can say, "No liquor shall be made or sold in our State." Several States have said this. Then, any town can say, "No liquor shall be sold in our borders." Many towns have said this, even where liquor was sold in other parts of the State. "The civil danger law," what does that mean? It means that saloon-keepers must pay for the harm they do. If they give enough liquor to a man to kill him, the friends of the man may make the saloon-keeper pay many thousands of dollars.

Good strong wings this Angel of Temperance has! And what is that sword in his right hand? It is the sword of "Public Opinion." Perhaps you will understand it better if should tell you it is what people say must be done. I will tell you a strange thing about this sword of Public Opinion. It is growing larger and stronger all the while! Whoever heard of a sword getting bigger after it was made? It is no sword with any other sword. The sword of Public Opinion grows, by more and more people every year joining in the cry: "The saloons must go."

And what about the chain which the Angel of Temperance holds in his hand? Its links are made by the good habits people who have learned to do without such drinks as beer, brandy, wine, and whiskey. Yes, a chain of good habit there is nothing that can so effectually bind the drink monster. Let us help in the fight.

GUIDO RENI'S PICTURE OF MICHAEL TRIUMPHING OVER SATAN

comfortable but non-intoxicating. He noticed that "cabby" had no overcoat, and inquired how it was that he was so insufficiently clad. The man explained his poverty, and Mr. Pearse said: "Well, now, I've got a coat upstairs that would suit you. But before I give it to you, I'm bound to tell you that there is something very peculiar about that coat, and it is right I should explain it to you, before you put it on." "What's that, sir," said the man, considerably mystified, and not knowing whether he might not find it wise to decline the mysterious garment. Said Mr. Pearse, solemnly, "That coat never had a glass of beer or spirits inside of it from the day it was made until now. I want you to promise me that as long as you wear that coat you will let 'the drink' alone." "All right, sir," said cabby, holding out his hand, "all right, sir; I won't upset the coat by putting any drink inside of it." Many months afterwards, Mr. Pearse met the same man again, and learned that he had kept his bargain. "No, ma'am," said the Pullman porter to the lady behind us, "the saloon does not trouble me any. Since my conversion, three or four years ago, I have never touched a drop of liquor of any kind, and my wife gets my wages."

In the Blooming Summer

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

EARLY RELIGIOUS NURTURE

NO question is heard more frequently from conscientious parents than the question, "How soon shall I begin the religious education of my little child?" The answer is obvious, if there is reasoning from analogy. Education is not cramming with facts, it is not cultivating the memory, it is not even giving instruction, although these things end to it; education is the preparation of the soul for life. If we would have thrifty plants in the garden, we give them conditions for development—a good location, good soil, good fertilization, sunshine, air, atmosphere, and then we expect growth. Little children are plants in God's garden; let them be well started in the nursery, then nourished and brought up. Before the enemy has a chance to sow tares, let the mother sow the good seed of the Kingdom. Very early should tiny and be clasped in prayer, and little children taught to now their heavenly Father. From the first period of consciousness they should be surrounded with an atmosphere of prayer. The Bible should be read in their hearing, and when they are old enough, they should read it and learn it for themselves, and thus be fortified for life, and armed against temptation.

They who teach classes in the Sunday School—classes drawn from the Christian homes of the land—often are amazed at the utter and dense ignorance of the Scriptures which is found among young people. They do not know the beautiful Bible stories, once familiar in every home. They hunt vaguely through the New Testament for the minor prophets, and look in Kings and Chronicles for Ezekiel and Jeremiah. The Bible vocabulary, so rich, so varied and so picturesque in its diction, is passing out of the ordinary English style of the later writers, because it is literature they do not know. Let the parents of the period, so over-solicitous about the culture of the individual, so fearful of treading on the rights and privileges of any child, give each child at privilege and right which is his by God's decree, a thorough and early nurture in the ways of the religion and undefiled. This includes Bible study, prayer, and, still further, Sabbath keeping and attendance at church.

The child who is early trained in duty, will not wander from the straight path when maturity comes. Strong and vital will be the grip of the household religion, of the mother's love, of the father's faith in God.

Things Every Child Should Learn

Every child should learn by heart the Ten Commandments; The Apostle's Creed; the first, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, nineteenth and one hundred and third psalms; the Sermon on the Mount, and as much more of God's word as he or she has time for. Every child of a Christian home should be able to recite a goodly number of hymns, "Sun of My Soul," "Lead, Kindly Light," "Abide with Me," "Rock of Ages," "Jesus, I My Cross Have Taken," "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," and "My Country, 'tis of Thee," among them. Every American child should be familiar with the Declaration of Independence, and the pivotal dates of the country's story. Every child should know something of the great men of the Bible, the great men of the Reformation, and the great men of the United States.

Manifest Peril

A terrible tragedy lately occurred in New York, where a brother shot and killed another, and then instantly killed himself. One of these men was a very brilliant author, rich, courted and famous, though a hunchback; the other had been started wrong and was a failure, and disheartened to the point of insanity. Both were sons of one mother, nearly of an age, and had been brought up in a home of singular refinement, traditional aristocracy and unstinted luxury. The father, offended with one boy because he would not fit into the groove the father preferred, refused to have him at home in youth, and finally disinherited him. The result is a commentary on the old text "Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath."

Though seldom a seed of bitterness springs up in such a harvest of hate, yet one never knows what crop may come from injustice. Only love never faileth. Love suffereth long and is kind.

A Housekeeper's Ledger

English women are very particular in keeping their household accounts. So are French women and Germans, who look very carefully to the income and outgo of the household, balancing every item and knowing where their money goes and for what. Americans are too ready to spend at haphazard and not get all they ought from the dollars they receive from the bread-winners.

MAKING HAY

The lads are off for war or trade;
Beside the hearth the old men sleep.
The women in the fields must toil,

And pile the hay in fragrant heap.
Heigh-ho! who cares, the sun is bright,
And we shall rest when comes the night.

Mr. Earl, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has arranged a housewife's ledger, which will be a great and almost indispensable assistant in any family to which it is admitted. Under separate headings as clothing, for help, incidentals, etc., are perpendicular lines, within which cost, weekly allowance, weekly income, details, sum total and every necessary bit of information may be set down in black and white. I cannot think of a better wedding present for any young couple than this admirable and exceedingly useful book.

AT BEDTIME

COURSE, I'm never sleepy at eight o'clock!
I'm just as wide awake
As my great big brother who stays downstairs
His maps and fings to make.

But I lay my head on the pillow down,
And that is the last I know,
Till morning comes and my mother calls;
The night is so swift to go.

There are millions of stars to light its way,
With their twinkling lamps you see.
And its cars are full of passengers,
All fast asleep like me.

Summer Boarders

EVERY summer sees the exodus of city people from their crowded streets to the highways and the byways, the ocean shores, the hill slopes, and the green valleys of the great free country. Boarding season begins in June and continues until October, and many good housekeepers on the farm and in the rural village count upon it to replenish the household exchequer, and fill up empty purses. Or if there be no pressing immediate need for money, they wish to lay something aside for future exigencies; something for the rainy day, for the possible emergency, and so they rent their rooms, and spread their tables, and take mothers and children, young people bent on having a merry time, and old people who want rest and refreshment, to tarry awhile under their roofs.

Among the needs-be of the summer boarder is dainty cleanliness in the house, and thorough drainage with tidiness outside. To walk through a back yard where decaying vegetables and the heads of the chickens which furnished yesterday's dinner are lying about in plain sight, is far from appetizing. The matter of drainage and of the destruction of garbage is too often forgotten by the farmer, with the result that dysentery, malaria, and typhoid haunt places that should be healthful, and people return from the country with disease-producing germs in their systems. The most radical cleanliness indoors and out is not too much to ask from the summer landlord. Then the beds should be good, furnished with springs, and with proper mattresses. Neither stuffy feathers, nor hard husks, nor inelastic straw make a good bed, though one need not have an expensive hair mattress to sleep in great comfort. Sheets must be of sufficient size, not short or skimpy. Plenty of water for bathing, and towels frequently exchanged, are essential to the needs of those who are used to city bathrooms.

The country housewife should give her guests excellent bread, and good butter, milk and cream, fresh eggs and farm produce. Fruit she cannot always compass, but fresh vegetables in their season she can prepare, and if berries abound, they may be set on the table three times a day.

And first, second, third, let her banish flies. It is astonishing that otherwise fastidious women will tolerate flies, swarming over food, dropping into milk and drowning themselves in tea. Away with these most superfluous pests. If one cannot have wire screens, mosquito netting, tacked across windows and barring exterior doors, will prevent the incursion of these miserable plagues. As for those who go to claim the hospitality of the farmstead, they should be considerate. They should make no unnecessary trouble. By promptness at meals, and quietness in the evening, after a certain country bedtime hour, which should not be later than ten o'clock, they may lighten the burden of their summer hostess.

Christian people sojourning in the country for the summer, should carry with them the habits of the home. They should spend their Sabbaths as sacred days, and do their best while in the strange, and it may be obscure and remote place, to help the local church and its pastor.

AUNT PRUDENCE'S EASY CHAIR

—INQUIRER. You ask if any American woman is entitled to use the word Lady? Lady Mary Curzon, nee Leiter, of Chicago, who has been the First Lady of India, has that honor. The number of American women who are countesses, baronesses, duchesses and otherwise titled ladies across the ocean, is by no means few. Some have been wooed for their beauty, others for their money, many for pure love. But every American woman is a lady, in her own right. I am sorry that the beautiful name has fallen upon evil days, and that many persons say "women" and "woman" when they should say "ladies" and "lady." Policemen and car-conductors should not have the monopoly of this excellent word.

A lady, as defined by the late Philip Hamerton, is a woman in a high state of civilization. The old meaning of the word is loaf-giver. Every house-mother is therefore a lady.

CHAPTER XXX.

Tenements and Tears

WHAT Hilda's petition was, her husband could not guess, but he surmised that it had nothing to do with the business that had brought them to New York. Hilda sipped her coffee daintily, while he looked at her in dismayed silence.

"I suppose I am a clumsy fellow," he said at last, drawing his brows together in an effort to recall the past. "To tell you the truth, Hilda, I wasn't properly brought up in one direction. I don't know anything about women—I never knew any." His eyes as they rested on her face were so honestly appealing that she broke into a light laugh of amusement and triumph. "I'm not so terrified as usual just at this minute," she said, gaily; "and I will take advantage of the fact to tell you that I am simply dying to go to the opera."

"Is that all?" he said. "Why didn't you say so at once? Am I such an ogre that my wife is afraid to ask for an opera ticket? Of course you shall go! I haven't seen everything myself. Uncle did not care much for play-houses for me, though he was passionately fond of music." "But I have never seen any opera," said Hilda, plaintively. "I often feel so ignorant—and indeed I am ignorant and uncultured. I wonder that you could ever have cared for a raw country girl like me, Immanuel." She looked so sweetly humble as she said this that he was tempted to heaven knows what in the way of rash vows.

What he did say, with all his honest soul in his brown eyes, satisfied her for the moment. "You are all that I wish you to be, Hilda." After a pause, he added, with a smile, "Shall it be Trova-tore, then?"

"Yes, please, and thank you very much," said Hilda, gently.

"And you will go with me to see some of my tenements this morning?" he asked, laying down the paper.

"Of course," she assented, raising her eyebrows ever so little; "I haven't forgotten why you brought me to New York. It wasn't to amuse me; it was just to see those tenements."

He moved uneasily in his chair. "I had hoped—I supposed that you would care," he said in a low voice.

They were soon climbing a dark staircase in a tenement block. "Where are we going," whispered Hilda, nervously. "How close it is here; I'm afraid it will make me faint!"

"We shall be up in a minute, dear," he answered reassuringly. "I want you to see Mrs. Mulholland and her children."

"Who is Mrs. Mulholland?"

"One of my tenants. I am going to ask her to move; in fact they must all move; this old barrack is coming down next week."

"It's a dreadful place," she panted; "perfectly dreadful!"

"Isn't it," he assented. "I am ashamed to call it mine. After we have seen this, I will show you a house I'm not ashamed of."

He was knocking at a low-browed door on a narrow, ill-lighted corridor as he said this. The whirring beat of a sewing-machine, driven at a furious rate of speed, stopped for an instant, and a shrill voice bade them enter.

Hilda gathered up her fresh skirts daintily and grew a little pale as her husband opened the door, and motioned her forward. It was a tiny room with one window, before which, bent almost double under the low, sloping ceiling, sat a white-faced girl sewing on a lapful of some blueish material. The sewing-machine afore mentioned stood in the middle of the floor, with its operator in a broken-backed chair. She was a tall, angular woman, dressed in a ragged calico wrapper, bound about the waist with a bit of twine. Three or four small children in various stages of dirt and untidiness, squatted on the naked floor. All were working busily; one sewing on buttons, another overcasting seams of the same stuff, which was piled about the girl by the window. There was a tiny cook-stove in one corner, Hilda noticed, and a bed, dingy and tumbled. A bit of cheese and a broken loaf lay on the table.

"Good morning, Mrs. Mulholland," said Immanuel, shaking hands with the woman. "I want to introduce you to my wife."

The woman stared with lack-lustre eyes at the slim figure in the doorway. "Won't you come in?" she said civilly. She rose as she spoke, and set out the one chair.

Hilda shook her head, and glanced appealingly at her husband.

"My wife has never been in the city before," he said easily; "she finds your stairs hard to climb."

"They are hard, that's certain," said the woman; "but I guess there's stairs most everywhere. I don't care nothin' 'bout 'em as long as I kin git plenty of work."

"What are you doing now?" asked Immanuel, eyeing the blue stuff with a frown.

"Postal-uniform pants," said the woman, wearily. "We get nine and a-half cents a pair for 'em. I ain't anythin' to complain of, sir. We've been doin' splendid since you was so good to us. Lizzy, there's workin' to home now; an' we've always plenty to eat, ain't we, children?"

The children nodded, their gray, pinched faces taking on the semblance of a smile. One of them pointed to the table with pride; they had had enough and to spare.

The woman wiped her eyes. "I don't know where we'd be now if it wasn't for you, sir," she went on. "An' the children was to the country two weeks in August. It done 'em so much good; I hardly knew Gerty when she come home."

"I am going to ask you to move, Mrs. Mulholland," said Immanuel. "This house must come down next week."

"Come down! Oh, Lord save us, what for? just as we're fixed so nice an' comfortable."

"You shall move into one of my new houses, my good woman. I will see that you are moved. You will be far more comfortable there than you are here. Will you not enjoy three rooms and a closet, with water in your kitchen, and— But you shall see for yourself, you and Lizzy."

The woman shook her head. "We couldn't never pay for three rooms," she said, hopelessly. "I ain't makin' but six pairs a day; I can't do any more; an' the children eat an awful lot."

His eyes moistened. "The rent will be no higher," he said, gently. "I am sorry, but you will have to go. I will pay you and the others for lost time, and Brown will move you. Don't be afraid, Mrs. Mulholland, I mean to help all I can."

"I know right well you do, sir," cried the woman. "There ain't many like you, Mr. Rossi. I'll do just as you say, an' may heaven bless you an' this sweet young lady!" She turned to Hilda, who was tapping her foot impatiently on the dirty floor. "This ain't no place for the likes of her," she added in a whisper. "Lord! if my Lizzy was like her!"

They stopped at three or four other doors as they went down. In one room a young Italian woman was mourning the death of her first-born. She took no notice of their presence, but wailed and rocked herself to and fro in tearless anguish. Hilda drew away from the little coffin with a shiver. "Don't ask me to stay here," she whispered, sharply; "I can't bear it."

Immanuel stooped over the young mother and whispered something in her own tongue. She looked up, her great eyes fixed and staring, then burst into tumultuous sobbing.

"She will be better now," he said to the swarthy woman in a gaudy neckerchief and ear-rings, who sat at the mourner's side. "Give her this," and he slipped a folded bill into the hard palm.

"What did you say to her?" asked Hilda curiously, as they emerged into the street. "How thankful I am to be out of that dreadful place," she exclaimed, with-

Artistic Monuments

Cost No More than Plain Ones in

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the iron of steel. Moss growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not invest in it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers use White Bronze in preference to granite for their funeral places. We have designs from $1.00 to $1,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Over $70,000 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers in the last few years.

out waiting for an answer. "Must I see any more? My head aches dreadfully from the disgusting smells—ugh."

"What if you were forced to live there always?" he asked quietly.

"I just couldn't," she cried. "I am not that sort; respectable people never live like that." A frowsy woman with her bonnet askew brushed against the crisp skirts as they turned the corner. Hilda shuddered. "I don't think this is a nice place for me to be in," she said fretfully. "I shall just ruin my new dress."

He looked down at her in silent dismay. "Never mind the gown," he said at last, "you shall buy a new one. But I must show you—I am so anxious that you should understand, Hilda."

The note of mingled anxiety and entreaty in his voice brought a smile to her lips. "What if I don't want to understand?" she said within herself. Aloud, she repeated her request to return to the hotel. "You can tell me about it all just as well, can't you, dear?" she cooed. "I never could endure the sight of such wretchedness. I am so tender-hearted; it always makes me unhappy for hours afterward."

"That is exactly the point," he said eagerly. "It makes them ill. Didn't you see the girl's face, and the children, how gray and pinched they were?"

"Yes, but how are you really going to help them? You will move them into a cleaner place, I dare say; but the woman will have to work just the same. You couldn't help that. I know I am very stupid, but it seems to me that ignorant people will have to do what they can, and take what they can get for their work."

"You are not stupid at all, my dear," he said, looking down at her with some amazement. He had expected—he hardly knew what—from his wife, sympathy, certainly, eager compliance with his plans, a soft womanly compassion for these suffering toilers. But this shrewd probing to the root of social conditions seemed singularly inappropriate as associated with long-lashed violet eyes, and soft rose-tinted cheeks.

He drew away from his wife a little the better to look at her in this new light. "It is a question that involves the very foundation of business and social relations," he said slowly. "It is all wrong at present. That woman is working for a contractor at starvation wages. She has a right to fair wages for her work and a decent house to live in."

"There must be thousands like her," she said coldly.

"Yes, thousands upon thousands. And some, as the poor thing said, even worse off than she. I found her paying an exorbitant rent for that wretched attic, her children slowly starving to death; the girl Lizzy in a sweat-shop. I did what I could."

"What did you do?"

"I reduced the rent to begin with; gave them food—oh, it was nothing. But there are so many—so many."

"Do you intend to spend all of your money in this way?"

"Yes."

"Will it do any good in the end?"

"I cannot tell. I only know what I must do."

There was silence between the two after this till they reached their hotel. Immanuel was bitterly disappointed, though he could scarcely have told why. Hilda was thinking. Her air-castle lay in ruins about her; but a substantial foundation was already laid for a structure of quite another sort.

"You think me very foolish, I know, dear Immanuel," she said to him after luncheon, "but you must remember that I never visited a city slum before. I was so shaken by it that I am not quite myself yet."

His eyes brightened as they rested upon her. She was lying back in the depths of a wicker chair, her fair hands folded in her lap. Something in her attitude reminded him of the day when she had appeared to him in the guise of a pure young angel freshly descended from the sky. "I ought to have told you about it," he said, penitently. "I suppose I can hardly imagine how such sights would appear to eyes accustomed only to comfortable village life. I am inured to it by actual experience." Then he told her of his guardian's experiment and of his own subsequent residence in the real slums.

"And did you really live in one of those elegant houses we saw yesterday?" she asked eagerly. "I wish I could see it!"

"You did see it," he answered, smiling at her pretty enthusiasm. "Do you remember calling my attention to a lady and two little girls coming down the steps to their carriage?"

"Was it that house? Oh, Immanuel!"

"The money required to keep that house up for one year would save a thousand children from starvation," he said, deliberately.

"Do you think it is wrong to love beautiful houses and pretty things?" she asked, tremulously.

His stern young face softened as he saw the color rise in her cheeks. After all, she was only going over the same ground where he had himself almost been beaten. For an instant he allowed himself to picture her in surroundings such as he could give her. She was young and very beautiful; she would shine like a star, he told himself, in one of the palaces yonder. Then he drew a deep breath. But it was all a mistake. "Life—life consisteth not in the abundance of things which a man hath." He repeated the words aloud, almost timidly. They had never talked much of their religion, these two. She had told, with a pretty, serious air, that she was a member of the church. And he had foreborne to question her. The sanctuary of that maiden heart had seemed to him too sacred, too holy to invade. "I know that we are one at heart," he added, after a long pause. "We cannot arrange our lives after the world pattern—we who are followers of Him who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister."

Hilda was silent. She was hoping that Immanuel was not going to be disagreeably religious. She had joined the church at the age of fifteen, more to rid herself of the distasteful homilies of her Sunday School teacher and pastor than for any other reason. She believed vaguely but comfortably that this act entitled her to admission to a dubious "heaven," where people wore white dresses all the time, and played unremittently on golden harps. The question of salvation having been settled thus easily, she did not often trouble herself about what she termed "such matters." "Goody-goody people always make me awfully cross," she was accustomed to declare with a charming smile. "I fairly shiver and turn green when people begin to quote Scripture at me and that sort of thing." Remarks of the kind were frequently addressed to an audience of her youthful admirers, and were regarded as exquisitely witty, judging from the applause and laughter with which they were invariably received.

She sat quite still now, her eyes downcast. After a little, the corners of her mouth twitched; in another instant, two big tears chased each other swiftly down her pink cheeks; then a diminutive handkerchief was called into action, and the blond head went down on to the arm of her chair.

"Why, darling—darling! What is the matter? What have I said to grieve you?" He took the little sobbing figure into his arms, and soothed her against his breast, as tenderly as her mother might have done. It occurred to him that this exquisite fragile creature had no mother; that she was as much alone in the world as himself. He rebuked himself sharply for his obtuseness, his hardness of heart. What, after all, were any number of seamstresses or slum children to him, compared with this one woman whom he had vowed to love, to cherish and console above all others. He had never before seen Hilda in tears, and the sight moved him profoundly.

WHY SOME MEN SUCCEED AND OTHERS FAIL

Labrador, nor even the wilds of the Canadian Northwest would seem to afford opportunity to become a railroad king, a bank president, or a university chancellor, yet Lord Strathcona spent nearly half a century in the wilderness as Donald Smith before he entered public life and became all these things, and peer of England as well.

BEING A NATIVE of the country or of a city has much to do with one's life-history, and, strange to say, it is youth spent in the country, with all its limitations and lack of advantages, that seems to give the best chance of success, though the vast majority of triumphs are necessarily won in the cities. Senator Doliver declares that nearly all great men in America were from the farm.

The late President McKinley, when traveling through the West shortly before his death, saw through the car window, a barefoot farmer boy. He remarked to his companions that "that was the kind of a boy he had been." The party included the Cabinet, three Governors of States, and four United States Senators; yet everyone of them confessed that he had been just as humble and just as rustic in his early years.

Replies from forty successful men, collated by Rev. Charles Townsend, a Cleveland pastor, shows that only eight were born in cities. Of the remainder, twenty-two were born on farms, and ten in small villages. The boyhood of these men was passed largely in the same surroundings, three moving from farms to villages while boys, but only one from farm to city. However, at the average age of sixteen, all these successful men went into the cities to try for fortune. Only two men out of the forty had well-to-do parents. All the rest bore the yoke of poverty. Only six stated that their early advantages were good, and only three were willing to say that there had been no lack felt in youth.

"IT IS RATHER curious to consider why so few New Yorkers have become prominent," says Charles F. Wingate.

Country Bred Boys Take the Honors

"In a published list of one hundred leading citizens of the metropolis, over ninety were shown to be country-bred. Seth Low, Theodore Roosevelt, George Gould, Louis Tiffany, Charles W. Dayton, Stuyvesant Fish, Perry Belmont and Edward M. Shepard were 'to the manner born,' but the leading divines, editors, doctors, artists and business men are from other States or other lands. Is it from lack of mental or physical vigor that the city stock is distanced by these competitors? The same conditions exist in London, Paris, Berlin, and other European cities, which are filled with strangers from the provinces, who, because of their greater energy and capacity, supplant the city-bred men.

The country boy often bemoans his lack of chance as did Clay, Webster, and thousands of others, and thinks his youth among the rocks, the mountains and the forests has been almost thrown away; and he longs for the time when he can shake off his farm fetters, and flee to the city where there is opportunity. But years after, in some great legislative emergency, perhaps in some contest with the city-bred youth, the rocks, the mountains, the streams, the granite hills which had unconsciously entered into the fibre and stamina of his life, rush to his assistance, and force his city opponent to the wall.

OBSTACLES ARE incentives to the right kind of people. They furnish the ready work to be attacked next, they lend zest to the struggle and glory to the overcoming. Failure to struggle and overcome obstacles will land anyone on the shallows of failure, to strand there forever. It would be well if every young man, before beginning his career, would look in the face the fact that obstacles are not only inevitable, but that they are an essential part of the training for real success. Were you to find a man who has had no obstacles to overcome, you would find one who if, by any exceedingly rare chain of circumstances, he had been able to acquire success, would, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, be unable, in the case of any real difficulty, to hold it.

PRESIDENT JAMES A. GARFIELD, himself of humble origin, said in an address to young people: "Let me beg of you in the outset of your career, to dismiss from your minds all idea of succeeding by luck. There is no more common thought among young people than that foolish one that by and by something will turn up by which they will suddenly achieve fame or fortune. No, young gentlemen, things don't turn up in this world unless somebody turns them up. Inertia is one of the indispensable laws of matter, and things lie flat where they are until they are endowed with activity and life. Luck is an ignis fatuus. You may follow it to your ruin, but not to success. A pound of pluck is worth a ton of luck. Young men talk of trusting to the spur of the occasion. That trust is vain. Occasions cannot make spurs, young gentlemen. If you expect to use them, you must buckle them to your own heels before you go into the fight. Any success you may achieve is not worth the having unless you fight for it. Whenever you win in life, you must conquer by your own efforts, and then it is yours—a part of yourself."

The message from every successful life history is that no circumstance of birth, heredity, or so-called chance can absolutely bar the way to any determined soul. Man was made to rise superior to outward things, and if he fails, he alone is to blame. He may not know his weakness, his fault, his mistake, but it is somewhere. Some step was taken on the wrong road, some duty was neglected, some opportunity not seized. No matter how many times you have been set back, there is still a chance for you. It is harder to climb after a slip, but rally your forces, and up you go. Never repine over seeming misfortune or hampering environment. These should merely serve to show of what stuff you are made. Success is in you, and failure is in you, and you may choose which you will show forth.

LITTLE PLEADERS FOR OUTINGS

"CAN WE GO?"

THREE ragged little men walked into THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office last week and announced:

"We want to go to Mont-Lawn. We haven't got no teacher to tell about us. We came ourselves, please."

Assured that they could go, and cordially invited to call again, they plucked up courage to prefer other candidates.

"Me little brudder—can I bring him?"

"I got two little sisters—"

"Dere's a shoe black what wants to go."

Chorus: "Can we bring a lot o' other kids what don't go to no Sunday School, an' ain't got no teacher?"

Such applications will pour in upon this office until the hot weather is over. Suffering little ones come for relief.

In the slums, missionaries go from one wretched, overcrowded, sweltering abode to another, extending invitations, and from every nook and corner of stone-paved court and alley, and from the very steps of bar-room doors, where little ones cluster under shadow of awnings, small voices pipe pleadingly: "Please, ma'm, can I go?"

And every child begs for another child—often for a little brother or sister, carried in arms or tenderly led by the hand. Sometimes a faithful, motherless one rises up from her toil over washtub or stove, and, catching her "baby" (as she calls the wee brother or sister) left in her care by a dead mother, in her arms looks earnestly into the missionary's eyes, saying:

"Yes, ma'am—please, ma'am, I'd be glad to go if I may take me baby."

Only $3 gives a waif a ten days' outing at Mont-Lawn; $6 sends two; $9, three; $15, five; $36, twelve, and so on. Contributions of money should be sent to this office with correct name and address for appropriate written acknowledgment; of children's clothing, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

Rescued Men Tell Their Story

Safe in the Old Lighthouse Shelter, the Bell of the Richness of Divine Mercy—Travelers "Going Home"

On a recent Sunday morning, there sat upon the platform of the Bowery Mission two men. One was an example of sturdy, vigorous old age; for though he had come to his four score years, it was not yet with him "all labor and sorrow." The other had but recently crossed that threshold in life which leads into full manhood. Both are toiling in the Master's vineyard. After the eleventh hour, the man of eighty had gone in at his master's bidding, and is joyously spending the remnant of his life in Christian work. The younger man, having scattered tares and wild oats with a lavish hand in life's early years, has, at twenty-three, passed into the vineyard to spend the lengthening day for a new-found Lord.

One in the hopefulness of youth, the other the peacefulness of old age, each testified that Sabbath morning for his Lord. The younger man's testimony, in effect, was as follows: "In my earliest days, I yielded to every possible sinful tendency till, as John Bunyan said of himself, 'While quite a youth in years, was an old man in sin.' My descent into evil was swift indeed; for at thirteen years of age I found myself a convicted felon expiating my offence behind prison bars. While I was in prison my good mother visited me, and with such tears as only flow from a mother's eyes, and with words which only maternal love could dictate, she entreated me to turn over a new leaf and to leave the jail a reformed boy. But I came out with a heart harder than ever, and for nine consecutive years I plunged headlong into dissipation and sin. Then I married a pious young girl who, with all the ardor of Christian heroism, strove to break the spell of wifely love to rescue me from my sinning. I repelled all her holy attempts to reclaim me, and rapidly going from bad to worse, I abandoned all for sin—home, wife, and our innocent wee babe. I gave up all, and ere long found myself a homeless, hungry, friendless, ill-clad wretch on the wery.

"One night I strayed into this mission. At first, no part of the service had any influence over my cold, hard heart. But suddenly I found myself arrested by a new and mighty power. A song was being sung, 'Lord, I'm Coming Home.' Every word was a keen heart-thrust for me—

I've wandered far away from God;
The paths of sin too long I've trod.

Never remember, in all my life, to have wept more; but as words and music swept across my soul, the fountain of my tears was opened, and I wept hot, bitter, penitential tears. Hung myself so completely upon Divine Mercy that I, too, could say, 'Lord, I'm Coming Home.' That's seven weeks ago. Since then I've prayed that God would open my eyes to my earthly home and now, Glory be to God! I can say all round, 'now I'm going home,' for I'm off to Canada to join my wife and child. Yes, friends, 'I'm going home.' Few eyes were tearless at this touching ritual.

Then up rose the veteran, the bronzed sailor, whose seafaring life in every port of the globe had been but one prolonged debauch. He told his story with rich pathos, though there was a decided "cattle" flavor about it. He closed with a reference to Tennyson's poem, "Crossing the Bar," and seeing the "Pilot Face to Face." The poet's maritime figure had captivated the old man's fancy. He burst into rapturous testimony, saying that he, too, after a long and perilous journey, and, till seven years ago, was hopelessly adrift, but had now found his bearings. He, too, would soon be "Crossing the Bar," and would see his "Pilot Face to Face." He, too, was going home. To such life experiences—so different, yet so similar in results—are seldom heard, even in the Bowery Mission, where the testimonies take the widest possible range. They produced a marked effect upon the large audience of men and boys, who listened to every word with rapt attention.

These are typical instances of the class of men who are rescued by the Bowery Mission. Every year, hundreds of such wanderers, sick of their lives of sin, are cast up like human wrecks on the rocky coasts of the Bowery. They see the shining signal in the old Lighthouse tower, and they know that its friendly ray will lead them to a haven of safety. Once within the Lighthouse, they are in a place of rest, and among friends who are eager to aid them to restored strength and to better lives.

These further contributions have been received in response to the appeal for "One dollar a year and no more," in aid of the spiritual and rescue work of the Bowery Mission.

MY SONNET

BY CHARLES E. MARTIN

DEAR Lord, in grief I gaze upon thy face
Writhed in agony, yet divinely fair,
I hear thy cry upon the dark'ning air!
And 'neath thy crown of thorns, sweet love I trace.

Thou Son of God! Thou Saviour of the race!
What son of man hath heart to breathe thy prayer?

Can mortal love with that of thine compare?
Thou Christ! Revealer of redeeming grace.

Teach me to understand my ransom price,
Let my sad heart bleed till its cost I learn;
Teach me the worth of blood-bought Paradise;
Give me, O Christ! the wisdom to discern
The true import of thy great sacrifice;

For this, dear Lord, make me forever yearn.
—The Standard.

"A Grand Work of Art"

Rev. J. Wesley Sullivan, Philadelphia, writes: "Ever so pleased with marvelous premium. It is a grand work of art. All my friends are pleased with it. I wish everybody had it. I am sure everybody should subscribe for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I have it bound every year since 1882."

BODY HEAT

Reduced 20 Degrees in Summer.

Never eat heavy carbonaceous foods for the morning meal, for these foods should follow and not precede hard work.

The best morning foundation is Grape-Nuts and cream, a little fruit, a cup of Postum Food Coffee and possibly a couple of eggs prepared to suit the taste—this breakfast is sufficient to satisfy the hardest worker, either of brain or muscle, until the noonday meal.

Particularly is this true at the present season of the year, when meat and other fatty foods increase the internal heat of the body and make the summer day still more disagreeable.

Grape-Nuts come to you from the grocer ready to serve, having been fully cooked at the factory by food experts and this saving in time and exertion is appreciated by the housewife as well as the economy, for being a concentrated food, four teaspoonfuls is sufficient for the cereal part of a meal for one person and costs only one cent.

A booklet of excellent recipes is found in each package of Grape-Nuts from which many easy and delicious warm weather dishes can be made for luncheon and supper that are not only nutritious but pleasing to the palate.

A trial of the above selection of food for ten days will prove to anyone that health and vigor, an active mind and a keen enjoyment of the pleasures of summer will take the place of poor digestion, a dull brain and that heavy draggy feeling caused by improper food during the hot weather.

PRACTICAL HUMILITY*

Considerations Which May Help to its Attainment

AMONG all Christ's ethical teachings there is probably none so frequently ignored, especially among ourselves, as this of humility. To push ahead, to disregard the feelings and the comfort of others, to get and hold the best places, and to vaunt ourselves on our success are the commonest features of our life and character. We pride ourselves on our democratic principles, yet was there ever a people that so eagerly sought titles, military or scholastic, as we! We boast of our character, of our wealth, of our society, of the towns we live in and of the section of the country from which we come, and, not content with this, we depreciate other people and other localities, as if by so doing we gain more glory to ourselves. We are gratified by our association with people inferior to ourselves. The result is frequently an arrogance and an unsympathetic spirit which dwarfs our own nature. No man is so little likely to grow and develop as he who has a high estimate of himself, and this is produced more surely than in any other way by the comparison of ourselves with others less successful than ourselves. We need not only a higher standard by which to measure ourselves, but a more generous recognition of qualities in others which deserve our admiration.

By a twofold revelation, Christ supplies this means of promoting humility. He shows us the character of God, telling us about him, about his infinite love, his patience, his magnanimity, his mercy and kindness, and inspiring us with his own reverence for the Father. He does more. By his own example he shows us how Godlike our human life may become. As we study his life, and wonder at his patience with people who misunderstood him; at his gentleness in contact with the harshness and bitterness of his chosen associates, and at the sweet compassion of his beneficence, we learn how far our own lives fall short of that beautiful life, and see how much reason there is for humility. One scene alone speaks volumes. It was that last evening of his earthly life, when the twelve disputed so passionately about their relative positions in the kingdom that they hoped he was about to establish—each claiming to be the greatest, they omitted a practice that in that land and time was a matter of ordinary custom. No one was willing to take the servant's place and wash the feet of the others. So they dispensed with the custom and sat down to supper without it. The gentle and beautiful reproof Christ administered, by himself performing the duty, must have been a lesson they never forgot. We are too apt to forget it, in churches and societies, and if a man is elected to a position lower than he deems suited to his abilities, he is very likely to refuse to serve. The readiness to be useful in any capacity, to do any duty that needs doing, so that Christ may be honored and his cause advanced—this is rare.

Practical humility does not mean self-disparagement. It would be foolish to ask any man to rank every man he meets as being higher and better than himself. He would be a hypocrite, if he pretended to do so. He is superior to many others, and it is useless to require him to ignore the fact. But even so, if he is really humble, the association does not minister to his pride. He remembers the advantages he has had, the environment which has helped him, and which probably the other has not enjoyed. The very gifts which have made him superior are God-given, and he may wisely ask himself whether he has made all out of his capital that he might have made. Besides this, he may remember that in every one there are qualities which claim his admiration. In the lowest, there are generally elements of a higher life which might be developed, and in all there is the capacity for a higher life which God recognizes. For the lowest and the meanest Christ died, and surely if he could see in them the value for which he was willing to lay down his life, we too, may do our part toward their reclamation. We have not fully imbibed

Christ's spirit, if this practical humility has not become a part of our character. The Pharisee has abundant reason for blessing God that he is not as other men, but he will not go down to his house justified like the publican, if his consciousness of his superiority does not make him kindly and helpful to the publican, and more anxious to turn to account the gifts with which he has been endowed.

WHY DON'T THEY GO!

A Way to Push Off the "Hang On's."

Perhaps some day you will wake up to the fact that coffee is quickly and surely doing the business for you. You wonder why the symptoms of disease, which grow more and more pronounced, do not disappear, but hang on in spite of all the medicines you can take.

Fixed organic disease may result if you keep up your present course, and yet it is an easy thing to give up coffee and get well. Have your cook make Postum Food Coffee strictly according to directions, and that is easy. Use enough of it and boil long enough to bring out the taste, then you will find that the famous food drink will satisfy your coffee taste and the old troubles gradually disappear.

There are hundreds of thousands of cases in America that prove the truth of this statement.

A gentleman from Columbus, Ga., says, "My wife had been an invalid for some time and did not seem to yield to any sort of medicines. She could not eat anything without distress, and naturally was badly run down in every way.

Finally we concluded that perhaps it was the coffee that hurt her, so she quit it and went on to Postum, also began using Grape-Nuts Breakfast Food. She immediately began to improve and kept gaining strength and health, now she can eat heartily of anything she wants, vegetables and anything else, without hurting her. She has gained thirty pounds since she made the change.

I saw such an improvement in her health that I decided to quit coffee myself and you would be surprised to see the change. I have gained in flesh about twenty-five pounds, and have entirely lost the old, dull headaches that I used to have so much.

Our two children are very fond of Postum. You can use my name if you like." T. M. Coggin, 1220—10th Ave., Columbus, Ga.

Before the Dawn

The Apostolic Warning that the Spiritual Night is Far Spent

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WRITING to the Christians at Rome, the Apostle Paul uses an expression (Rom. 13: 12) which reminds us of where we are in the scale of time. "The night is far spent," he says we are in the night season as regards the world, and we ought to know it. "Knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep." If in the time of the Apostle Paul it was time to awake, how much more now! The world is in a dream, and believes that this is its day-time; but all the real light since the time when "the Light of the world" was put out in the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus Christ, the light has existed only in the feeble witness of the few children of God who, since the time of our Lord, have been shining "as lights in the world, holding forth the Word of life." The world, blinded by "the god of this world," has mistaken night for day, and darkness for light; and has looked upon intellectual culture and the progress of knowledge in science, invention, and discovery, as all the light that is needed to make this world a paradise. And yet the weary, anxious, dissatisfied faces, the nervous tension, the unrest, the bitter strife, and the oppression of man by man, speak of a sad night of darkness, a chaos and confusion, which needs again the Voice which spoke when, in the material world, "darkness was upon the face of the deep," to say once again, "Let there be light" (Gen. 1: 3).

Because "the night is far spent, and the day is at hand," because we are looking for him who is "the bright and morning Star" (Rev. 22: 16), therefore "let us cast off the works of darkness, and put on us the armor of light." Paul, who in this epistle has been bringing to light the awful depravity of man in the heathen world, and of the Jew, shows how both Jew and Gentile are together guilty, and that there is no difference on this point, for "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God"; and then shows how utterly gratuitous and how completely righteous is the grace of God in the propitiation of Christ and his justification of the ungodly. Then he goes on to show the power we have in the life of Christ, who dwells in us by the Spirit, to live the very life of Christ in "newness of life," and to be conformed to the image of his Son, and then unfolds his purposes with the Jew and the Church and sums up all in the word "Therefore" (Rom. 12: 1), "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service."

The apostle speaks to justified, saved, sanctified people, when he appeals to them, by the mercies of God, which have made them such, to respond to him as living sacrifices, as offerings of themselves to him. When he says, "And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God," he presupposes that they seek no other will but that will of God. Therefore he writes, including himself, "Let us, therefore, cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light. Let us walk honestly as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying." But he excludes himself when he says, "But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof." Paul took his place as crucified with Christ, and could say, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me" (Gal. 2: 20).

Let us, as children of light, learn another lesson from this passage. The night is far spent; signs of the morning are appearing on the horizon,—gleams of light in the movement among the Jewish people; signs here and there in the Mission Field of a moving of the Spirit of God on the old Pentecostal lines. There are inventions, especially in the facility of communication and rapidity of traveling, which seem to prepare for some great crisis in the future.

Question of the Week

Is a lawyer justified in doing his utmost to secure the acquittal of a client of whose guilt he is cognizant?

He Should Not Clear a Guilty Client

A lawyer has no more right to uphold wrong than any one following any other profession. If he is positive that the client is guilty, he should not try to clear him and allow some innocent person to be punished in his stead. In many cases a lawyer does not know whether the client is guilty or not until he has had a trial and been proved guilty. In doubtful cases, he has a right to do his utmost to win the case for his own benefit and for his client, who may be found not guilty when all circumstantial evidence is against him.

HENRIETTA SPAULDING.

Lincoln's Idea of the Question

The lawyer would be legally justified, and it is a common practice; but a thoroughly honest man will not accept a case from a client of whose guilt he is cognizant, unless the client will confess his crime and plead guilty. Then it would be morally justifiable for him to make the most of any extenuating circumstances to mitigate the penalty, or, if possible to secure his acquittal. Thayer gives this characteristic illustration of Lincoln's view on the subject: "One day a stranger called to secure his services. 'State your case,' said Lincoln. A history of the case was given, when Lincoln astonished him by saying: 'I cannot serve you, for you are wrong, and the other party is right.' 'That is none of your business; if I hire and pay you for taking the case,' said the man. 'Not my business!' exclaimed Lincoln, 'My business is never to defend wrong, if I am a lawyer. I never undertake a case that is manifestly wrong.' . . . 'Not for any amount of pay?' continued the stranger. 'Not for all you are worth,' replied Lincoln." M. R. D. DINGWALL.

Professional and Legal Privilege

A lawyer has professional and legal privilege to act as counsel for a client whom he knows to be guilty, and is morally bound to make the utmost endeavor to secure for him all the rights, privileges and immunities which the law allows. Even with an absolute knowledge of his guilt, no one questions his obligation and duty to save the man from unjust sentence or excessive punishment. Here his moral duty ends. No one is ever justified in attempting to prove a lie, in court or out. No lawyer may conscientiously persuade a judge and jury of the innocence of a criminal, knowing him to be such, and secure for him acquittal and freedom from the law. It would be a great travesty of justice, subverting the fundamental principles of righteous law and moral order. A lie is never justifiable. The Scripture doctrine of strict adherence to truth is the only right, safe and proper rule under all circumstances. WALTER W. HUBBARD.

to be heard. His counsel stands for him. His voice is the voice of the prisoner, and for him not to present his case to the best of his ability, would place the trial of the accused in the court-room on a par with the lynchings that frequently take place outside. J. S. MCNULTY.

The Duty of an Attorney

It is the manifest duty of the attorney to give his client the best work, irrespective of the fact as to whether he is or is not cognizant of his guilt. But he should do no violence to the truth, for that would be dishonesty. The lawyer's best skill and judgment are the commodity the client purchases, and if he pays for it, he is entitled to its use, in so far as it is consistent with truth and the ethics of the profession. As a rule, a lawyer should not undertake the defense of a criminal when cognizant of his guilt, unless he makes a special agreement with him that he will render only such service as will protect him in his constitutional rights. There are exceptional cases, however, where an attorney ought to do his best, within the restriction mentioned, to se-guilty, from the fact of his inability to intelligently or coherently explain his environment, yet by circumstances, direct and positive, that I may develop, prove him unjustly charged, or if guilty, justify by the circumstances his acquittal. I may be "cognizant" of circumstances that may lead me to believe him to be guilty, but I cannot know him to be guilty until the evidence is heard, and I have no right to assume that he is, nor take his word of admission of a status that surrounds him in law, the consequences of which he is wholly ignorant, but of which, by my experience and knowledge, I may know. Knowledge of guilt is no justification for a lawyer to withdraw his aid from defence. It is the lawyer's duty; to tribute to his professional skill, learning and character to defend his client, until the evidence shall remove from him that protection which the law of the land gives him, "innocent until proven guilty." He could not do less, even to follow the example of the Master. OLIVER M. WILSON.

No Upright Lawyer Would Do So

An upright lawyer will not do his utmost for his client's acquittal, if he knows him to be guilty of a wilful and deliberate violation of the law. He will work that justice may be done (Exod. 23: 7; Deut. 1: 16, 17). But if his client's violation of the law was not wilful or deliberate, and if there are extenuating circumstances, then the lawyer is justifiable in doing his utmost for his acquittal, especially if his client is one who has had few advantages. S. F. E.

How Rich Criminals Escape

The defending of a known guilty person by our best lawyers is one of the greatest perils that menace our institutions, and creates contempt of the law by those who have plenty of money. Criminals by the thousand, whose crimes are known by all, walk unblushingly among their fellow men to-day, as the result of some unprincipled lawyer helping them to evade the just penalty of their crime. Where there is a just reason to doubt a criminal's guilt, he should have the benefit of every doubt, but in the case of known guilty no lawyer should ever be allowed to get the thief, or worse, released on a mere technicality. WM. W. CASE.

It Would be Acting a Lie

Not at all! When he accepts a case, I feel compelled to plead in behalf of his client, be he guilty or otherwise, for he is paid to do it, to defend him, and get him acquitted if possible. Yet in doing this, he is acting a lie, not sincere. He believes one thing and professes publicly to believe another. And it is not justifiable, but wicked, judged from moral and Christian standard. The client, guilty, ought not to be acquitted, thereby defeating justice. I cannot understand how there can be many Christian lawyers who plead cases. Yet every criminal is allowed some one to defend him. SARAH A. FALL.

C. M. D. B., Washington, D. C., puts the question: "Wherein is the memory of a person honored by placing his picture where it will necessarily be defaced?" (i. e. on the postage stamps). But same inquiry might be applied with equal force to revenue stamps, paper money of all sorts, and to coin. In each case, the ultimate end is obliteration or defacement; yet from time immemorial has been regarded as an honor paid to a man, woman to place the portrait or effigy of the person on the stamps, paper money, or coinage of a country.

It Would be Perverting Justice

No honorable lawyer will engage to clear a person whom he knows to be guilty, and such attempts to pervert justice should be a penitentiary crime. When consulted by the guilty, he should tell him that he could not clear him, that it would be wrong to try, but that he would be willing to do his utmost to show the palliating circumstances, so that the penalty would be as light as possible. To plead in court that his client is guiltless, and try to prove the same is an outrage upon his own conscience, harmful to the character of his client, and an insult to the public sentiment that government and safety and prosperity rest upon justice. A. W. LEWIS.

How the Law Provides for the Criminal

The law wisely and in a spirit of humanity, has provided that every criminal shall be convicted only on the observance of certain technicalities in the manner and form of trial. It raises in his behalf the presumption of innocence, secures to him the right of trial by jury, the aid of counsel, the right to be present at every stage of trial, etc. This not only gives him the right of counsel, but it makes it the duty of counsel to defend him to the best of his ability and to raise in his favor all possible points that are his under the law, whether he personally believes him guilty or innocent. The guilty must be defended to determine the degree of guilt. The accused has a right to cure the release of his client, though cognizant of his guilt, as, for instance, where a young person commits crime under palliating circumstances, and the attorney conscientiously feels that more good than harm would result from his acquittal. M. C. ROBERTSON.

A Lawyer's Point of View

A broad question, without conditions, qualifications or limitations. Nevertheless, it may be answered conscientiously—Yes. "Cognizant," however, is hardly the proper word, I take it, as intended. It does not mean, in the fullest sense, "to know." At most it implies belief, or "to be informed," "to know," implies knowledge of facts. A man's guilt "requires to be proved by evidence," and a lawyer cannot know the fact until the evidence is heard. Quoth Nicodemus, "Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth?" (John 7: 51). It would seem that the example set by the Master in John 8: is good enough to follow to-day. He was conscious of guilt in the woman when he told her, "Go, and sin no more." Yet because of this knowledge, did He refuse advice and counsel? He knew her guilt, yet he acquitted her. He stood as mediator between her sin and redemption; to listen to her accusers, though he knew she was guilty. "Sin no more." The lawyer's analysis of the evidence may show a cause of guilt, of wrong-doing, justifiable in his client, who, though guilty, yet in the law may be acquitted. I may believe my client

GENERAL VIEW OF THE CAMPUS, NORTHFIELD

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

A Summer Pilgrimage to Northfield

ALREADY the summer pilgrimage to Northfield has begun, and many are setting their faces toward the pleasant midsummer retreat, which the late evangelist Moody so painstakingly and lovingly founded and fostered that it might be a Mecca for Christians of all denominations. Rich in promise and varied in character, the programme at Northfield indicates that help and inspiration may be found there throughout the coming summer in every department of Christian service. The speakers announced are men of international reputation, both in Bible knowledge and power as teachers. Much interest centres in the Summer Bible School, which will cover the entire month of July. Continuous courses of Bible study, under teachers well-known and experienced, will give to all who attend a deeper insight into the Scriptures, and in methods of study and teaching.

Prominent among those who will contribute to the helpfulness of Northfield this summer will be Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. Since he bade farewell to his own church work and country, hardly a year ago, the best results of able and earnest service have crowned his connection with the Northfield Extension Movement, under which he has conducted chief conferences throughout the East and Middle West. He is now spending a few weeks in rest before entering upon his summer duties. This does not mean idleness to Mr. Morgan, however, and he is giving at Mount Hermon School a daily course of Bible lectures upon "Typical men in contact with Christ." He will remain in Northfield during the summer. He is announced as one of the platform speakers at the Student Conference, June 15 to July 6; at the Summer Bible School, July he will lecture upon the "Crises of the Christ," and at the August Conference, he will give a series of studies in "The Minor Prophets," in addition to frequent platform addresses.

Rev. W. W. White, President of the Bible Teachers' College, New York, will lecture at the Summer Bible School. Side by side with other leaders in the ever-broadening Christian movement among students, Dr.

White has filled an important place in many conference gatherings of students, as well as of other Christian workers. His experience as a teacher of teachers will make the Normal training of special value. How to first grasp a large portion of Scriptures in outline, then consider its details in their setting and connection, will be illustrated by his teaching of "The Writings of Luke the Physician." The method of study will be such as may be pursued in relation to other parts of the Bible, and will prove suggestive to all who teach the Word.

THE AUDITORIUM, NORTHFIELD

Another teacher in the July Bible School will be Rev. John Kelman, M.A., Minister of Free New North Church, Edinburgh, Scotland. His ability and success have already won for Mr. Kelman mention among the eminent clergy. His influence has been especially marked upon the young people of his congregation, and upon the students of Edinburgh University. This will be Mr. Kelman's first visit to the United States.

To condense into one brief paragraph any adequate statement of the life and work of Robert E. Speer is an impossibility. A Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, closely identified with the Student Christian and Missionary movements, a powerful speaker and writer, a scholar and a student of the Word of God, it may well be doubted whether any other man of his years exercises a wider or more profound influence. Again, he will be one of the leading speakers at the Student Conference in Northfield. Never will one forget Mr. D. L. Moody sitting with the throng in the auditorium, utterly absorbed in this young man's message. The great heart of D. L. Moody recognized in Robert Speer a fellow-member of the "Inner Circle" of his Lord's disciples, and he loved him and the words he spoke.

Rev. F. B. Meyer, of London, always welcome at Northfield, will be present at the General Conference of Christian Workers in August, and will be one of the post-Conference lecturers. Others who will address the Conferences during the summer are Mr. John R. Mott, New York; Dr. Woodrow Wilson, Princeton University; Rev. J. Whitcomb Brougher, Chattanooga, Tenn.; Rev. A. T. Pierson, D.D., Brooklyn; Rev. W. Ross, England; Rev. A. C. Dixon, D.D., Boston, and Rev. Henry G. Weston, D.D., Chester, Pa.

During the past few years, many people have come to these conferences in parties. The late Mr. Gibbud, of Springfield, used to fill several tents with workers associated with him. The New York Presbytery has for two years occupied Weston Hall; the Yale College delegates hope this year to crowd East Hall; more than fifty Christian Endeavorers from New Jersey have already arranged for their party, while the ministers of an Eastern Methodist Episcopal Conference are also planning for a visit in company to Northfield. Rustic summer homes on the "Kenjockey Lodge" plan are appearing on the hillside. The Conference-Seekers of 1902 will surpass in numbers those of any other year. This beautiful retreat, rendered doubly dear to Christians by its memories of Mr. Moody and his work, never looked so lovely as it does at present.

... A Sermon by ...

of the Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church, Chicago

THE SINNER'S RETRIBUTION

TEXT—Galatians 6: 8: "He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption"

SOME familiar texts are like powerful tonics. They have a snap and strength which we do not always find in the Water of Life, when it is held in strange and peculiarly labeled bottles. They are like the lullabies with which we were sung to sleep in childhood. They have been repeated over and over again by the lips of our departed loved ones, so that each word is made sacred by holy associations. Every time we speak them, it seems as though these words were the ushers welcoming us into the vestibule of the church in which the service was held when we gave our hearts to God. Or these texts are associated with the sermons of some famous minister, which we have either read or heard.

But though many great preachers have spoken from this text, and though many holy associations gather around its words, yet I would fain speak upon it, for two reasons: First, because I am passionately fond of the country; therefore, any text which has in it the figure of the sower and the reaper—any simile which is scented with the smell of the new-mown hay, or of the clover-tops; any figure which echoes the song of the wood-robin, or the call of the nightingale; any text which is glinted with the golden colors of the wheat fields, or reddened with the hectic flush of the autumnal leaf—has for me an intense and suggestive fascination. My heart never beats more exultantly than when it is keeping time to the music of the mowing machine, or to the swish of the swinging scythe.

The second reason why I speak from this text to-day is because the springtime of the year, when the American sower went forth to sow, is only a few weeks past. The ploughs only a short time ago had the rust of many months rubbed off their sharp noses. The harrow's teeth are yet white from chewing and breaking the sods. And the sower, with his bag of seed hanging upon one arm, and his handful of seed swinging at the end of the other arm, only a short time ago, with measured tread went across the fields, scattering the seeds to the right and to the left. May God help us to teach the lessons of a sinner's retribution, in the language of the spring planting.

Like Produces Like

The seeds of the flesh, by the inexorable law of the fields, can only produce the harvests of the flesh. This statement is an axiom, a self-evident fact. So self-evident is the law that the seeds which are planted only produce harvests after their kind, that a United States Agricultural Department has been established, the chief purpose of which is to introduce into the different localities the right kind of seeds for the best development of the different kinds of crops. The official head of this department is a member of the President's Cabinet. Every year, at public expense, thousands of seed packages are scattered over the country. Each Congressman has an allotment for gratuitous distribution among his rural constituents.

As there is a spiritual law in the natural world, so there is a natural law in the spiritual world. And the sower to the flesh has no more right to expect to reap the harvest of the sower to the Spirit, than a farmer has a right to expect to gather a crop of barley from wheat seeds, or a crop of oats from corn seeds, or a crop of rye from cotton seeds, or a crop of potatoes from muskmelon seeds. Any sinner who is trying to argue himself into a different spiritual belief is not only mocking God, but making himself ridiculous. Elon Foster tells us that one day, a sinful Roman master told his Christian slave to go into a certain field, and sow a crop of barley. When the time of harvest came, the master returned to that field and found there a harvest of oats ready to be garnered. In indignation he called his slave, and asked, "Did I not command you to sow here a field of barley? Why then have ye sown oats?" The Christian slave answered, "Master, I sowed oat seed in the hope that they would grow up into barley." His master gruffly said, "What foolishness is this? Has ever any one heard that oat seeds will produce a harvest of barley?" "Ah, master," replied the Christian slave, "you yourself are constantly sowing in the world the seed of evil, and yet you expect to reap in the resurrection day the fruits of virtue. Therefore, I thought also that I might get barley by sowing oats." And the sinful master was abashed and could not answer a word.

Go where you will, you will find that the sower to the flesh always reaps a harvest of corruption. Sit with the judge upon the bench, and he will tell you that the young man standing before him for sentence did not think that the seeds of sin, which he planted in secret, would ever take root and begin to sprout. He did not think that his sowing a few "wild oats" would ever cause his downfall. Yet God was watching him sow those seeds. His employers were watching him. Almost every large business house in the great cities has spies detailed to follow the tracks of its employees. So, when the money disappeared from the safe, the detectives naturally hunted up the young man who spent his Sundays at the races—the one whose companions were not what they ought to have been. They naturally came to that young man, and put the hands of the law upon his shoulder, saying, "Come, young man. The convict's cell awaits you. Come!"

Charles Stewart Parnell was one of the keenest, shrewdest, most far-seeing Parliamentarians Ireland ever produced. For years, alone and single-handed, he fought the British Parliament. But Charles Stewart Parnell, genius through he might have been, was not able to destroy the harvest of his secret sin. How then, can the ordinary young man, who has sown the evil seeds, hope to be declared guiltless, when Charles Stewart Parnell had to reap from the flesh a harvest of corruption.

Sin an Irreparable Evil

The physician in the sick-room will teach you that the sower of the flesh always reaps the corruption of the flesh. Upon the bed of suffering lies an invalid. He may pray, he may groan, he may promise to do right in the future; but the physician says: "No, my friend, good intentions do not eradicate the physical wrongs of the past. You must reap the seeds of gluttony, the seeds which once sparkled in the wine cup, the seeds of late hours, the seeds of the defiance of moral laws. Dying man, you must reap the harvest of the sins of the flesh which you have sown."

Stand with the minister in his pulpit, and he will teach you the same lesson. He will tell you that though a man may repent of his sins, he must up to the grave's edge suffer from his past misdeeds. God may forgive the sinner, and all the results of the past evil may cease, when the sinner robes himself in the white garments of the redeemed. But all through the remainder of the sinner's earthly career, he must suffer for the evil which he has done. The minister will tell you that one of the saddest sights of Christian work is to see an old man, who has been converted at the eleventh hour, hobbling along upon his cane through the harvests of corruption which surround him everywhere. He stumbles through the harvests which have come from the seeds of his own planting.

Mr. Moody once powerfully, though horribly, described a picture which he saw in the Parisian exhibit of 1867. The title of the picture was "Sowing the Tares." The central figure of this picture was a man with the face of a demon, going across a field scattering the seeds of sin far and wide. As those seeds fell, they were instantly changed into repulsive forms of life. From out of the ground came the long, shiny bodies of serpents and snakes. The serpents were not only seen lifting their heads up from the black soil, but the sinuous bodies were everywhere. They were entwining themselves about the limbs of the sower. They were pushing their heads into the bag of tares. They were kissing, with their cancerous lips, the lips of the demon. They were licking, with their long forked tongues, the hand of him who was scattering the evil seeds, while the dark forests which surrounded this field of sin were filled with the gleaming eyes of hyenas and wolves and tigers and man-eating lions, ready to banquet off the carcasses of human flesh. So, when a man sows to the flesh, he must reap a harvest of the flesh. When he sows vice, he reaps impurities. Sowing slothfulness, he reaps failure. Sowing evil thoughts, he reaps evil deeds. Sowing death, he reaps physical, mental and spiritual condemnation. A farmer always reaps the same kind of harvest as the seeds which he has planted.

The Law of Self Multiplication

The seeds of the flesh, by the inexorable laws of the fields, are expected to produce more of a harvest than the original seeds which have been sown. It would be folly for the farmer to sow five hundred kernels of corn, if he could only receive in return half a dozen ears of corn; to plant twenty or thirty peas, if he could gather in return but a few pods, or to labor at all, if for every planted seed there would come up only one kernel in return. But when the farmer has a small bag of wheat seed, he says to himself, "Now, if I properly plough and harrow the ground, and plant those seeds right, I will be able to gather a whole field of golden grain. One of my seeds will be able to reproduce itself many, many times." Benjamin Franklin once said that the reproductive power, the prolificness of vegetable life, is simply inconceivable and without limit. We all remember Daniel De Foe's story of the shipwrecked sailor. He found a half-dozen small wheat seeds. From those few seeds he was able to develop all the wheat he wanted, both for himself and his negro servant. The South Sea

Islanders became a corn-raising and corn-eating people merely because Captain Cook, the Columbus of the Pacific, in one of his voyages gave to the natives a few kernels of corn.

It would be a happy solution to the sinner, if, when he sowed one evil seed, he should get back only one evil result. But that is not the way the harvests of the flesh grow. One evil seed will become the parent of many evil seeds, the grandparent of a host of evil seeds and the great-grandparent of a lifetime of evil harvests. A sower unto the flesh always reaps more corruption than he expected to gather.

The Calloused Conscience

A notorious pirate was hanged in New York City about a century ago. Just before his execution, he testified that the first time he murdered a man, his horror and remorse were so great that he could not sleep for weeks. But after this monster had continued to wet his lips with human blood, he declared that he could drive his sword into the heart of a woman, or a little child with no more compunction than he would bury his feet in a piece of bread. He would sleep as peacefully after murdering a ship's crew as when a babe he closed his eyes in his mother's arms. The first lie is the difficult one to tell; not the tenth, not the twentieth, not the fiftieth. It is the first glass of whiskey which is the hardest to drink; not the one which the drunkard takes just before he enters the reptile-inhabited dungeons of delirium tremens. It is the first seed of sin which is hard to sow; not the fiftieth nor the one hundredth. And each one of the tares sown is able to reproduce itself in evil habits a millionfold. A sower always expects to reap more than he plants.

And if the evil results of tare planting are so awful in reference to our own lives, how much more awful must be the results when we plant those tares in the lives of others. A woman who had talked unjustly against her neighbors, once went to a priest for confession. After she told the priest the evil she had done to her neighbors, she asked him what she should do to undo the wrong. The priest gave her a handful of nettle seeds, and bade her go and scatter those nettle seeds over a field, and then come back to him. After the woman had done as she was told, she came back to the priest. "Now," said the priest, "go and gather those nettle seeds up again." "Oh," said the woman, "I cannot." "Neither," answered the priest, "can you ever undo the wrongs which you have done against your neighbors." Awful must be the remorse when converted man realizes that by his sinful sowing he has developed a harvest of corruption in the hearts of his neighbors. If he has planted there the evil seeds, so of them will come up. The natural and spiritual law are the same.

Postponed Harvests

The seeds of the flesh do not necessarily produce harvests of the flesh instantly. A long time may intervene between the time of planting and of reaping. Twice during the year, the farmer goes forth to sow. There is the spring planting. Then the rye, the barley, the oat seed is scattered. Then the corn seed is planted in the ground. Then the timothy seed is thrown on the field, so that the farm stock can have hay during the winter months. Hardly are these seeds placed in the ground, than the spring showers make the little tender sprouts come up. Then the fields everywhere are carpeted with green.

But there is a fall planting as well as a spring planting. Just before the summer birds migrate to the South, in order to escape the blizzards and the howling of the winter storms, the farmer goes forth and scatters his wheat seed. These seeds lie dormant under the snows during the long December, January, February and March months. If any grave-digger, on his way to exhume a Yorick's skull, should stop and drive his pick into that wheat field, and examine those seeds, he might think they were as dead as the king's jester. But when spring comes, those wheat seeds which have lain dormant so long, are roused by the blast of the spring resurrection. And a wonderful fact about nature's law is that the deeper the snows, the longer the winter, the longer those wheat seeds lie dormant, the stronger and more virile is the grain, when it begins to grow.

So some of the tares, or the sins of the flesh which we have sown in the past, may seem to take a very long time in developing. We may think, because we have sinned and never yet been punished, and have kept on sinning five hundred, a thousand, ten thousand times, that we never will be punished—that we never shall have to gather our harvests of corruption. But we will! As the Lord God Omnipotent liveth, we will! Christ in the parable of the tares explicitly states this fact. As the householder, he bade his servants leave tares continue to grow by the side of the wheat. But when the reapers come, they will first gather the tares into bundles and destroy them. Sinner, do not deceive yourself. God is not mocked. Do not think, because the day of retribution has been postponed, that the seeds of the flesh are dead, when they are merely dormant. As the long delayed wheat harvest is the strongest harvest, so the longer the punishment of the sins of the flesh is postponed, the greater and the more awful will be the harvests of corruption.

I once saw a woman reaping her harvest of the flesh, which she had planted a fifth of a century before. It was in our old Brooklyn home. The door-bell rang. I went to the door and ushered into the parlor a lady dressed in deep mourning. Her face revealed the marks of intense suffering. When my father came down in answer to my summons, the lady began to plead with him to intercede with the Governor for the life of her boy. He was a young man, under sentence of death. He was to be, and was electrocuted within six weeks. "Doctor Talmage," she said, "I want you to plead with the Governor, because my boy's life is all the result of my past sins. When he was a little child, he was very sick. The doctors gave him up and said he had to die. Then I knelt by my son's bed and defied God. I said, 'O God I will not let him die! He shall not die! You can destroy his soul; you can destroy mine, but I will not and shall not give him up.' Then, strange to say, Doctor Talmage, my boy had a sudden change towards physical recovery. In spite of all the doctors said, he got well. But, sir, from that minute, my life was changed towards God, and now I must reap the results of my past sins in my boy's execution. Oh, sir, will you not plead with the Governor to pardon my boy, on account of his mother's sins?" That woman reaped the harvest of her corruption twenty-two years after the seed of sin was sown. So when we sow to the flesh, sooner or later we shall all reap our earthly and eternal harvest of agony.

The seeds of the flesh always produce such great harvests, that many pairs of hands instead of one pair must be employed in the reaping. One man can plant in a day what it will take a score of men the same time to reap. The sower would be helpless, if he himself had to gather in all the results of his sowing. So every farmer has to look ahead to prepare for the harvest-time. And if he is the owner of a large farm, he rides around the country engaging extra laborers for the reaping. When the wheat is ripe, it must be cut and carried into the barns right away, else the grain will fall off, and the farmer will have no results from his planting but straw, which he uses for stall bedding. Six, seven, eight months of the year you may find unemployed men in the country. But during harvest-time, every healthy man can find work and big wages, if he is only willing to work and knows how to wield a scythe, or how to tie up the sheaves of grain.

Who are the reapers engaged beforehand to help the sower to the flesh gather in his greatest harvest, which is to be garnered at the brink of the open grave? They are the demoniac reapers. They are Satan and all his evil spirits. They are the demons that live in the impenetrable darkness of a lower world. They are the demons who will gather only the most corrupt of harvests. It is said that the week before Mazarin, the sinful French Cardinal, died, he hobbled through his art galleries crying and moaning: "Must I leave you, oh, my beautiful pictures? Must I give you up?" And the day before he died, he had himself roused and painted, and his servants passed before him and bowed and kissed his hand, and mockingly told him how well he looked. And when the French statesman died, he was bolstered up in bed, playing a game of cards! But when the Satanic reapers came to gather that man's harvest of corruption, they did not take along Mazarin's pictures, or his cardinal's hat, which he had disgraced. They only took away his sinful and depraved heart. Mazarin sowed to the flesh. The Satanic reapers garnered the corruption.

"Well," says some discouraged soul, convicted of his past sins, "what am I to do? I fully realize my evil past. Must I die an eternal death? Is there no hope for me?" Yes, my brother, there is hope for you if you repent of your sins, and throw yourself upon Christ's mercy, as wide as the forgiveness of God. I only quoted one-half of the verse from which my text was taken. The last half of the verse reads thus: "But he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting." The first half is a red light of warning, flashed far out over the troubled sea of sin. The second half is a beacon, inviting you up the narrows to the Harbor of Peace.

First, my brother, you must get your heart right for the spiritual seed-planting. In the far East, the ancient plough was made out of wood, and not from iron. You must let the beam of the Cross plough up your sinful heart. Then, having prepared the ground for the spiritual seed-planting, you must go to work for God with ten times one hundred times—aye, with a thousand times the zeal you have ever felt as a disciple of sin. You must enlist yourself, body, mind and soul, for the Gospel planting. As I said before, you cannot change the past. The past is dead. But—oh, by the power of the Holy Spirit, you can spiritualize the future! You can make your last earthly days honored days in heaven and on earth, because they have been lived for God and to help your sinful fellow man. "Whoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely." That means you; that means me. We can all come.

"No," you answer, "I will not; I cannot, I dare not come to Christ now. I have had too black a past. I have sown too many evil seeds to the flesh. I feel a great deal like that young college boy who was dying from an accident in Edinburgh. When the chaplain knelt by his bedside, and said: 'My lad, will you repent of your sins and look to Christ,' he answered: 'No, sir; I have served the devil all my life and served him well, and now at this last moment I would not be so mean as to ask Christ to take my broken-down body and my wreck of a life. No, sir, I would not be so mean.'"

But, my sinful friend, even with all your sinful past, is that right? Is that what Christ would have you do? If you had a wayward boy, and he had run away from home and trampled upon your bleeding heart for many years, would you want him to stay away and die, hardened against you and bitter, merely because he has been sinful and wayward? No! If you knew where he was dying to-day, you would take the very first train to him. You would go, if necessary, without even a change of garments. You would walk up and down the train, while it was in motion, because your anxiety would not let you sit still. And you would rush into the hospital, and rush to the ward, and throw yourself by his bed, just to give him a kiss of love and pardon. So, Jesus to-day begs you to live for him and come to him. My brother, will you let the Cross be the plough to change your heart? Will you take the good seed in your hand, and go forth to sow to the Spirit, so that you may reap life everlasting?

When John Todd was lying upon his dying bed, he had a strange vision. An angel seemed to lead him up and up, until the dying man stood upon the heights of a great mountain. Then the angel asked him: "Dying man, dost thou see anything?" And as John Todd shaded his eyes to look, he saw away off in the distance a fiend incarnate. The face of that fiend had upon it the look of unutterable woe. The features were so hideous, and the sufferings of this lost spirit were so great, that John Todd hid his face in his hands, crying, "Enough, enough! I cannot look any longer!" Then the angel turned and said, "That lost spirit, oh dying man, would have been your own, had not your soul been cleansed by the Blood of the Lamb." Then the angel of the Lord said, "Look, oh dying man, look!" And as John Todd lifted his eyes again, behold there was seen another spirit. It was garmented with a robe as white as the driven snow. The eyes were as loving as the purest love could express. The lips were moving in joyful praise. The hands were clasped about the figure of a cross. Then, again, spake the angel of the Lord, "Dying man, that is to be your redeemed spirit, your Spirit cleansed by Christ's blood, your spirit which shall never die." Then John Todd awoke. He said he knew not whether he had seen a vision, or had been talking face to face with Christ.

So, like John Todd's vision, this sermon teaches two lessons: The one points down the road over which are dragged the tares that are to be burned in the everlasting fires. The other points down the road over which the sheaves of wheat are triumphantly carried into the Gospel granaries. May the prayers of our loved ones and the sacrifice of Christ plead prevailingly with us not to sow corruption, but life everlasting. Yet all human beings are free agents to do as they will. They can accept or reject Christ. They can gather either harvest. "For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

PEACE BETWEEN BOER AND BRITON

The Long and Sanguinary South African War Ended—Terms Arranged at Pretoria

AFTER a bitter contest, extending over a period of nearly three years, the war between the Boers and the British in South Africa has been terminated by mutual agreement. There have been important concessions by either side, both having reached the conclusion that the time had come to end the long, sanguinary struggle, and avert further bloodshed. Terms of peace were arranged after a series of conferences in Pretoria between Lord Kitchener and Lord Milner, Britain's representatives, and Generals Louis Botha, Christian de Wet, Hertzog, Delarey and Smuts. General Schalkburger and President Steyn, of the Orange Free State, were also parties to the negotiations. Before the final terms were officially accepted by the leaders, they were submitted to the Boer burghers in an assembly at Vereeniging, and approved. They were then signed by the Boer representatives in the negotiations, General De Wet signing first. President Steyn was absent, in consequence of severe illness.

In substance, the peace terms are these:

First—The burghers are to lay down their arms, and recognize British sovereignty.

Second—All Boer prisoners are to be brought back as soon as possible to South Africa, Britain undertaking that they shall not suffer the loss of liberty or property, and that no action shall be taken against any such prisoners save in cases where they have been guilty of a breach of the laws of war.

Third—The Dutch language will be taught in the schools of the new colonies, where the parents desire it.

Fourth—The Dutch language will be used in the courts of law, if necessary.

Fifth—The burghers will be allowed to retain rifles for self-protection.

Sixth—Military occupation of the colonies will cease as soon as possible and a system of self-government substituted.

In addition to the above, it is stipulated that the Transvaal will not be taxed to pay the cost of the war; that $15,000,000 will be paid by Britain to help restock the Boer farms; that all rebels will be tried according to the laws of the colony where

That the question of granting the franchise to natives will not be decided until after the introduction of self-government. That a commission will be appointed in each district to assist in restoring the people to their homes, providing for their immediate needs as to food, seed, stock, they belong; that no death penalty will be inflicted, but that disfranchisement for life will be the maximum penalty for rank and file convicted of rebellion. At the earliest possible date, the Transvaal and Orange River Colony will be relieved of the present military occupancy, and civil government substituted, to be followed by self-government as soon as practicable.

etc., and, as far as possible, remedying the material losses caused by the war.

In addition to the grant of $15,000,000, the British Government will make liberal loans to the burghers, free of interest, for two years, and afterward bearing three per cent. interest. Those Cape Colony and Natal colonists who joined the Boers in the field, will be dealt with under the existing laws of their respective colonies.

At the final meeting in Vereeniging, General Kitchener, in an address, paid a high compliment to Boer bravery, and expressed the hope that now that the strife was ended all would unite to live in peace and friendship. Generals De Wet and Botha responded in speeches urging good comradeship.

On all sides the peace terms are received with cordial approval. London was jubilant over them, and the feeling at Bloemfontein, where the Boer delegates who attended the peace conference were welcomed by their Dutch friends, was no less enthusiastic. At a banquet in Bloemfontein, the Dutch and English members vied in their cheering. At the refugee camps there was general rejoicing, and the men and women were overjoyed at the prospect of returning to their homes.

Our Art Portfolio in Samoa

The following letter from a well-known missionary worker in Samoa, now on furlough in England, is expressive of the general opinion concerning the merits of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Art Portfolio, and is so interesting in other respects that we feel warranted in publishing it:

My family and I have been delighted with what you properly term "a marvelous premium." The pictures are all so rich, and the subjects so choice, that any home must feel itself enriched in possessing them. I shall certainly have them suitably framed, and hung up in the Mission House at Leone Bay, Tutuila, which is more our home than the place from which I write. Although I write from England as an Englishman, I write as one who is looking forward to many years of Christian work under the stars and stripes in American Samoa. I have been out there for fully eight years; and now here on furlough, and when summer is over hope to return to Tutuila. Your paper was introduced to me in the islands by an American lady. I became a subscriber, and have enjoyed its columns very much from the first copy I read. We have no English paper to touch it. I hope to have the privilege of being one of your readers for a long time to come.

GOLDEN TEXT—"A LIGHT TO LIGHTEN THE GENTILES AND
THE GLORY OF THY PEOPLE, ISRAEL. LUKE 2: 32

A GATE OF DAMASCUS

ANTIOCH IN SYRIA

APPROACH TO LYDDA

FROM Damascus, to which Saul came as a persecutor of Christians, to Philippi, where he began the conversion of Europe, what a stretch of land is covered, and what an amount of experience! We are told that Saul, on his way to Damascus, "breathed out threatenings and slaughter." So deep was his murderous purpose that it was in every breath which he drew. There was a savor of passion in his soul. But Jesus was as able to still that tempest as he had been to still the storm on Galilee. At his word, there was a calm in the soul of Saul, a calm which never left him. The very Christians who had greatest reason to fear him became his friends and protectors. He became to them at once "Brother Saul." Peter, James, John, and the other apostles had been three years in daily intercourse with Jesus. And how was all they had received from Jesus to prepare them for their work to be made up to Saul? When he retired to Arabia, was it not to be alone with Jesus? Let us not try to penetrate the veil that, in the Scriptures, is thrown over that sacred time in the life of Saul. He came forth from his experiences in Arabia to enter upon his life-work. There were side-long glances cast upon him by even so good men as those to be found in the church at Jerusalem. It was hard for them to "believe in him" with his past record. But Barnabas understood him, and called upon him to be his assistant in the work of evangelizing the great city of Antioch. They were true yoke-fellows, and labored together there for a whole year, until fully half of the people were won from idols to the worship of the true and living God.

In the Gentile city of Antioch, Saul was called Paul—the Greek form of his name—and by that name he is best known to the world. Paul was the great apostle to the Gentiles. That work was shared with Peter, who must first receive a message from heaven to make him willing to undertake it. As Paul said, "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision," so Peter might have said, for he laid aside all of his Jewish prejudices, and preached the Gospel to Gentiles and Jews alike. He healed the Gentile sick, and raised the Gentile dead to life. He withstood James and the elders of the church of Jerusalem and claimed the Gentiles as brethren. Peter suffered imprisonment for the sake of the Gentiles. What yokefellow Peter and Paul would have made! But God did not join them together. Instead, it was Barnabas and Paul. Together these went forth after their year's work in Antioch, commissioned by the Holy Spirit to preach the Gospel in far-away regions, and the prayers of those they had led to Christ followed them.

Barnabas and Paul went to Cyprus, and from the lowest to the highest, all heard the Gospel preached. Relatives and friends of Barnabas were among the number, for Cyprus was the place of his birth. Then the two missionaries came to another Antioch, not the beloved city in Syria, but one in Pisidia, that gave them cursing instead of blessing. And later, when they left its borders, invectives, stones and enemies followed them, instead of the prayers that gave them a sweet good-bye when leaving the other Antioch. And yet there were some in that wicked city whose hearts had been turned to the Lord, and who prayed for Barnabas and Paul.

Then on to Iconium they came, and to Lystra, and Derbe. Sometimes they had to restrain the people from worshipping them as gods, and other times they were pursued by men who sought to kill them. In each place they left a band of believers in Christ. After their mission in Derbe, they doubled upon their tracks, in order that they might further help those who had started in the new life. They were not deterred even from coming again to the bad Antioch in Pisidia. At last they came back again to Antioch, the beloved, and were welcomed with gladness and thanksgiving by those who had sent them forth with prayer. And there were eager listeners to the story of what they had seen and done.

Paul's missionary zeal was as a fire in his bones—he must go again when hardly a year had elapsed. He wanted to see his sons and daughters in the faith at Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch. His desire was that Barnabas should go with him. But God willed it otherwise. The yoke of fellowship had to be broken, and each started in his separate way. Paul was alone at first, but afterward was joined by Silas, and then by Timothy and Luke, the beloved physician. Barnabas took with him his nephew, John Mark. The outcome of this second missionary journey of Paul was to be greater than the first, for the new continent of Europe was to be sown with Gospel seed. This was God's plan, not Paul's, who was shown by a vision where the Lord would have him go, and again, he was "not disobedient to the heavenly vision." "Come over into Macedonia and help us" was the voice he heard in the vision, and over to Macedonia he went closed up the hole, that he might be waked up effectively. Then they prayed anew, but still in vain. "Ears have they, but they hear not." And let us not forget that we should be worshipping such idols but that Paul heard the cry of Europe, where our fathers lived, "Come over and help us." The names of the days of the week, reminding us that our fathers worshiped sun and moon and Tisick and Woden and Thor and Freats and Saturn, should be like daily prayer-beads to prompt us to thank God for what missions have done for us, and to prompt us to make our thank offerings that others may receive like benefits. Especially let us see to it that our redeemed white race shall send to the mission fields only the blessings, and not the curses of civilization.

Here is what Ex-President Harrison said of Missions: "The enemies of foreign missions have spoken tauntingly of the slowness of the work and of its great and disproportionate cost, and we have too exclusively consoled ourselves and answered the criticism by the suggestion that with God a thousand years is as one day. We should not lose sight of the other side of that truth—one day with him is as a thousand years. God has not set a uniform pace for himself in the work of bringing in the kingdom of his Son. He will hasten it in his day. The stride of his Church shall be so quickened that commerce will be the laggard. Love shall outrun greed. He exacts faith. He will not answer the demand to show a course of stone in his great cathedral for every thousand dollars given. But it may be justly asked that the administrators of our mission treasuries justify their accounts; that they use a business wisdom and economy; that there is no waste; that the workmen do not hinder each other. The ploughing and the sowing must be well done. These may be and should be judged—that is man's part of the work. But the care of well planted seed is with God."

An address was recently issued from six sects of Buddhists in Japan to the ecclesiastics of the world. It testified to the vast importance and success of Christian missions, but charged that the troubles in China were largely caused by missionaries. The annual conference of the foreign mission boards of the United States and Canada unanimously adopted the following reply, prepared by Dr. J. L. Barton, of the American Board. The reply opens by explaining that though the conference has no ecclesiastical authority it represents 40,000,000 Protestant Christians who support foreign missions and maintain more than 3,600 American missionaries in various parts of the world. It is significant of the real unity of Christian missions that their representatives unite in this fraternal address to Buddhists. The common ground is recognized that the fundamental principles of religion are the possession and practice of a universal love for all mankind, and the spirit of disinterested sacrifice in laboring for the salvation of the world. It is pointed out that these principles are supremely illustrated in the life of Jesus Christ, and that they are fundamental to Christian faith. The concluding words of the address, recognizing the noble sentiments expressed by the Buddhists, thus declare the essential difference between Christianity and other religions:

"We cannot conclude without referring to your statement that the fundamental principles of the different religions 'are analogous.' It is true that all religions are expressions of the sense of human dependence; we believe only one provides for the equal deep and real needs of human hearts for fellowship with God. It is true that all religions speak of higher truth, as you do of 'the great truth shining above,' but on one speaks of that truth as found in a loving, personal God, 'O Father.' It is true that all religions are expressions of man's feeling helplessness, but only one tells of a divine Saviour, who offers to man forgiveness of sin and salvation through his death."

THE COURSE OF PAUL'S MISSIONARY JOURNEYS

There was a notable convert the very first time he preached, a woman, whose whole household was brought to Christ. And the sweet flower of Christian hospitality burst into sudden bloom in her home as she entertained Paul and his company. What showers of blessing for Europe and America have followed the first drop of grace in the conversion of Lydia!

A missionary in China tells how the people of Honan, in a time of drought, prayed to their idols for rain—in vain. After some days, getting no relief, they concluded their gods were asleep, and a great procession was marshalled, that marched with noisy music to the great temple, where one man bored a hole into the plaster god, and put in a live scorpion, and

RUINS AT PHILIPPI

KONIYEH, THE ANCIENT ICONIUM

BIBLE-HOUSE BUILDING IN THE LEVANT*

By REV. H. CLAY TRUMBULL

PREACHING and teaching and Bible distribution have always been prominent departments of foreign missionary work in any needy land. Bible translating and Bible making have been more dependent on, and more promoted by, faithful and devoted foreign missionaries than by any and all workers in Christian and civilized lands. Hence, any memories of missionaries necessarily include the workers in Bible making.

At the present time, and so for a generation past, perhaps the finest and most imposing business building in Constantinople, even in comparison with all the stately and noble structures of the metropolis of the Turkish Empire, is the Bible House, that was built through the loving labors of an American missionary, aided by the contributions of American and native Christians. And thus, at that Christian and missionary centre in the Levant,

Day unto day uttereth speech,
And night unto night showeth knowledge . . .
Their line is gone out through all the earth,
And their words to the end of the world.

The founding of that building, and the work of the devoted man who put his life into it, are among my precious memories.

In 1847, Isaac G. Bliss, of Springfield, Mass., went out as a missionary of the American Board to Ezroom, in Eastern Turkey, and he was one of the first in opening up the valley of the Euphrates to missionary influence. Hard and tireless work in his field broke down his health, and in 1852 he was compelled to return to America. After his resignation as a missionary of the American Board, he was invited to go to Constantinople as the representative of the American Bible Society in the Levant. He accepted the position and entered with enthusiasm on his new mission. The work was not yet organized or systematized, and he set himself to the bringing of order out of confusion. His field included Greece, Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia and Persia. He sought to become familiar with all the missionaries in all his field, and thus to co-work with and aid them.

Dr. Bliss was a charming letter-writer, and he had the quick perception and warm sympathy that enabled him to say just what should be said to each person to whom he wrote or spoke. This gave him power with all in his great field. As Constantinople was the port at which all the missionaries landed before going to any station in his field, and as the annual meetings of those missionaries were for many years held there, and as he kept ever open house for them all, his personal influence with them was very great. Moreover, he was ever a missionary worker with them, as well as a Bible distributor, and his power for good was felt in all the Turkish Empire. But the cramped and unhealthy official quarters that he had were insufficient for his extensive work, and he conceived the idea of having a Bible House in Constantinople corresponding with that in New York, and to the securing of that he set himself. The American Bible Society said that he might have such a building if he would raise the money for it. Therefore, in 1866, he came to the United States to plead with Christians for the necessary funds.

A Hartford pastor called with Dr. Bliss on one of his rich parishioners to see if he would have a share in the new Bible House at Constantinople. As they talked in the rich man's elegantly-furnished parlor, the rich man said positively:

"I can't give to this thing. I have too many calls in every direction. This cause doesn't appeal to me."

Dr. Bliss looked up admiringly at the rich paintings on the wall, and said quietly, pointing to one of them:

"That is a beautiful picture. I wish some of my people could see it. There was a poor woman in my field. She had been brought to Christ by the missionaries, and she wanted to have the knowledge of Christ extended to others. Her home was a little hut or hovel with the bare ground for a floor. She had no bed or furniture or furnishing of any sort. Her only cooking or table utensil was a brass dish or basin, in which she cooked and from which she ate and drank. She heard I was trying to get money to build a Bible House, and she longed to have a share in the undertaking. But that brass dish was her only worldly possession. So she scoured that up clean and bright and brought it to me, asking if the price would help me, as it was all she had. I took it and thanked her. I sold the dish for a trifle, and the proceeds are part of my building fund. I think a blessing came with it. And that's the sort of helpers that I have in my field."

The rich man listened and looked. The tears stood in his eyes as the story struck home. He fumbled in his pocket, took out his pocketbook, and taking a roll of bank notes he handed them to Dr. Bliss, saying: "There are a hundred dollars I want to give you. I wish it was more."

That donation went into the Building Fund, but whether it is set down to the credit of the rich Christian in Hartford or to the credit of the poor Christian in Constantinople, the Lord knows.

Dr. Bliss spent his strength and his life in this way. In 1872 the new Bible House was finished. Dr. Bliss then came to the United States and secured the transfer of the printing and making of Bibles for the East from New York to Beirut, for which great multitudes will ever praise him. He died in the mission field, and was buried in 1889, at Assiut, in Upper Egypt, at an outpost of his immediate field of labor, from which point he had been desirous of pushing on his Bible work into the heart of Darkest Africa. But the Constantinople Bible House stands as a monument to good Dr. Bliss, while its glad rays stream out as a light to the Gentiles, in the land of the Crescent and of the shadow of death.

A MISSION IN A DANCE-HALL

ABOUT ten years ago a banker of Norfolk, Va., who began life by following the plough on his father's farm, happened to read in a newspaper an account of the proceedings of a convention of Christian slum Mission Workers, which was in session in a northern city. So great was the impression made upon his mind by the story of the work accomplished and work needing to be accomplished, that he then and there determined to devote time and money to the organization of an association with kindred aims in his own city. Inviting members from the different churches to meet in interesting a number where cots will be provided to accommodate one hundred men. An extension at the rear will give a big new kitchen, lavatories and laundry.

Like all seaport towns, Norfolk has within her gates many unfortunate souls who have wandered here from distant places. Hundreds of these wayfarers of the deep have been led to a better life through the kindness shown them at the Union Mission. Every evening an outside song service is held, after which the crowd which has been attracted by the music, is cordially invited to come inside to the chapel meeting.

A most interesting feature of the institution is the industrial work, quite prominent in which is the wood-yard, the carpenter shop and shoe shop. When a man is physically able, he is expected to pay his expenses in wood-sawing or other labor. Every day the jail is visited, and released prisoners who want to make an honest livelihood are taken to the mission home, and aid is lent them in finding work. The institution also seeks to procure employment for all who come to it. Last year work was found for 2,648 men. Letters filled with expressions of gratitude are received from men in all walks of life and in all parts of the world, who have him, Mr. Collins succeeded of people in this pious enterprise. At his own expense, a good-sized building, in the most degraded quarter of the town was purchased and fitted up as a Rescue Mission, and what was once a dance-hall was thus converted into a chapel for divine worship; and a former barroom became a neat reading room. Cots were bought and dormitories arranged for the homeless; and meals were offered free to those who were in destitute circumstances, or at the rate of ten cents each to others who could pay.

Since that November morning, when the heart of the good banker of Norfolk was moved to promote this excellent charity, the work has increased so rapidly that the building is about to be enlarged by two additional stories.

been reclaimed there. A Florence Crittenton Home for young girls, a Chinese Sunday School, and other interesting branches of work are under the same management as the mission.

"I can think," said a Norfolk citizen to the writer, "of no better illustration of the power of that mission's work than the case of a young man who was so degraded through drink that the police department would not have him in jail. He was carried to the mission; the workers took him, cared for him, prayed over him; and at last—God's transforming grace is wonderful!—that man gave up his evil ways entirely; joined the church, and led a better life steadily and faithfully to its recent triumphant close." THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a faithful visitor to this mission. Mr. Collins belongs to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family; he has taken the paper for fifteen years, frequently subscribing for others.

"Our institution is on a better basis to-day than ever before," said Superintendent Ashley, enthusiastically, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representative. "All the philanthropic people of Norfolk are interested in its welfare. The city gives $600 a year towards its support, and many of the poor are sent directly here by the municipal authorities. We have reduced crime and the city criminal expenses nearly one-half. One Sunday in the year all the churches take up a collection for us, and from many directions money is contributed. Ours is true rescue work, and God has greatly blessed it."

Peace in South Africa

JOY at the termination of the war in South Africa is expressed by both Boer and Briton. Gen. Louis Botha's declaration that the day on which the peace conditions were signed was the happiest day he had seen in many years, was paralleled by King Edward's statement that he was overjoyed at the conclusion of hostilities. The fraternization of the Boer Delegates with the British negotiators after the settlement was signed, shows how quickly brave men who have learned to respect one another as enemies, become friends when an agreement is reached.

The terms of settlement reflect credit on both sides. The Boers might, had they chosen, have prolonged their guerilla warfare for another year or two, keeping the country in turmoil, harassing their foes and increasing the loss in life and property; but they showed their patriotism as well as their wisdom by formally and definitely laying down their arms. The British on their side showed magnanimity worthy of a great nation. As will be seen by the terms of peace which are summarized on another page of this journal, the Boers will be able to resume occupation of their farms at once, and will receive from the British Government substantial aid in beginning life anew. They have the prospect, too, of sharing in the government of the country, so soon as they have demonstrated their loyalty to the new order of things. Every reasonable demand that they made appears to have been conceded, and there appears to be no reason why they should not be as happy and prosperous under British rule as they were under that of Mr. Krueger. Considering the enormous cost in money that the war has entailed on Great Britain, and the fearful loss of life which has been suffered by the British nation, the terms are extraordinarily generous. None of the vindictiveness that too often follows so terrible a conflict has been manifested, but, on the contrary, a friendliness which should go far to disarm the Boer of his antipathy to his former foe.

It is worthy of notice that King Edward has used his influence to bring about the settlement of the conflict, and this alone is an augury of good to the country. The only real concession on the part of the Boers is that of loyalty to the crown, for the country cannot long be governed from London. In a comparatively short time such self-government as is enjoyed by Canada and Australia will inevitably be conceded, and then the monarchy will be the sole sign of supremacy that will bind the country to Great Britain. It will be borne all the more easily, as the Boers remember that the King took the lead in securing for them honorable terms of surrender. That there will be friction for a time is probable, but when the Boer fully realizes all that is implied in the King's expression, "their common country," he will doubtless learn to adapt himself to the situation and will work amicably with his fellow citizens for the common good. He, too, like his foe, has suffered bitterly from the miseries of war and will now be prepared to enjoy the blessings of peace.

How God is Blessing India

DR. R. A. HUME, of Ahmednagar, India, the distinguished medical missionary upon whom the late Queen Victoria bestowed the Kaiser-i-hind decoration, in recognition of his valuable services to humanity during the great famine, is now in the United States on a visit. Dr. Hume, who was acting chairman of our Interdenominational Missionary Committee, is thoroughly familiar with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's famine orphan work, and hundreds of little orphan children in his district have been rescued and supported by the fund raised by our generous readers and their friends. The following letter from his pen will be read with unusual interest:

The work for the famine children in India is the most unique, the most promising, the most Christlike work which our missionaries in India are doing to-day. The ability of the missionaries to do this work is due more to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD than to all the other agencies combined. Every promise which Dr. Klopsch has made has been fulfilled to the letter. In behalf of the orphans, in behalf of the missionaries, and in behalf of India, I render my most cordial tribute of thanks to Dr. Klopsch, and to every man, woman, and child who has helped us to do this work.

Over twenty-five thousand famine children were the most important result, so far as Christian missionaries are concerned, of the famine. Of these, about sixteen thousand were taken by American missionaries, and of these three thousand were taken by the Marathi Mission of the American Board. The only considerable portion of these whose support is assured, is the large number who are supported through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. My wife and I, in the city of Ahmednagar, are responsible for 377. The improvement of the physical condition of these children is something marvelous. Of the 175 girls, only four have died, because they receive such careful nurture. Girls whose mothers never knew what a needle was have learned to sew so well that they are now teaching the younger girls how to sew. Every older girl has a younger girl to be her little sister, for whom she shall specially care, to see that she is tidy, prompt, and obedient, and to look after her generally. Every girl gets some schooling. Some girls have done so well that in one year they have gone through the studies for which most girls require three years.

The principal industry is rug weaving. Some of the girls can already nearly earn their own support. On the 23d of November, forty-five of the oldest girls of our 175 were admitted into the First Church on confession of faith. The examination which they passed before the Standing Committee was unusually satisfactory. On the 16th of March, 123 girls, and seventy-three boys, in our own care, were received into the First Church as catechumens. The sight of those boys and girls confessing their faith in the Lord Jesus Christ was most inspiring. Some of the most promising boys will be trained to be Christian workers.

In the Ahmednagar District, which had a population of 888,000 in 1891, the census showed that ten years later the population had diminished 52,000, on account of famine and plague; but the Indian Christian community had increased 300 per cent., from 6,334 to 20,764. The Kingdom is coming!

Our best thanks to the unknown faithful boys and girls, and men and women who regularly send their quota, through Dr. Klopsch, for this most encouraging work among the orphans of India.

Thus God is blessing India, and the prayers and gifts of our people are everywhere producing an abundant harvest.

Begin Now!

"WHAT shall I think about when I am dying?" wrote Ivan Tourgueneff, the famous Russian author and philosopher. "Shall I think I have made a poor use of my life? That I have idled and dreamed it away? That I have not known how to make the most use of its gifts? That I have not really had time to do anything?"

If these were the highest and noblest thoughts possible at the close of our life, we certainly could find little comfort in them. To look back, in those last fleeting moments, upon an existence that has been aimless and purposeless; that has produced very little, if indeed anything, that was good; that has been simply living to self, and down to the low level of mere personal indulgence or vanity—such a retrospect would fill the soul with unutterable anguish and regret.

At that supreme last hour, what will the world's fame and applause avail you? Will honors and high position and wealth console you? Will the knowledge that you have ploughed your way to material success at the sacrifice of much that was noble and sweet and true in character, be a soothing reflection to you?

To die right, it is necessary to live right. If you would experience the heavenly peace and tranquillity of the believer at death, you must begin to live the Christ-life now. Your heart once given to Him, you will be led by His example in all things. Every act of your life will have a new purpose—a new meaning. You will strive to live not for self, but for others; to live so that some small section of humanity at least may be the happier from its contact with you; so that some who had no kindred claim upon you, may remember you with a glow of gratitude; so that some poor, needy, erring wayfarer whom you lifted up and cheered and comforted, missing you at the last, may drop a tear of genuine sorrow to your memory. If you begin to live for Christ now, you may, with your talents, be the means of bringing many others into the light of spiritual liberty, before that last hour arrives of which Tourgueneff wrote. And then, when it does come, you will not have the painful experience of reviewing a useless, Christless life, spent in vain. With your hand fast clasped in that of your Divine Guide, you can look down the Valley of the Shadow undismayed, knowing that the eternal fields lie, bright and shining, just beyond.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Living Religion

—THE RELIGION of Jesus Christ is something to talk about with a glad heart. It is brighter than the waters; it is more cheerful than the sunshine. Do not go around groaning about your religion, when you ought to be singing it or talking it in cheerful tones of voice. How often it is that we find men whose lives are utterly inconsistent, who attempt to talk religion, and always make a failure of it. We must live religion, or we cannot talk it. If a man is cranky, and cross, and uncongenial, and hard in his dealings, and then begins to talk about Christ and heaven, everybody is repelled by it. Yet I have sometimes heard such men say, in whining tones, "We are miserable sinners;" "The Lord bless you;" "The Lord have mercy on you;" their conversation interlarded with such expressions, which mean nothing but canting; and canting is the worst form of hypocrisy. If we have really felt the religion of Christ in our hearts, let us talk it, and talk it with illuminated countenance, remembering that when two Christian people talk, God gives especial attention, and writes down what they say: "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written."

Watchdogs in Church

—THERE ARE in every community and in every church watchdogs who feel called upon to keep their eyes on other and growl. They are full of suspicions. They wonder if this man is not dishonest, if that man is not unclean, if there is not something wrong about the other man. They are always the first to hear of anything wrong. Vultures are always the first to smell carrion. They are self-appointed detectives. I lay this down as a rule without any exception that those people who have the most faults themselves are most merciless in their watching of others. From scalp c head to sole of foot they are full of jealousies and hype criticisms. They spend their life in hunting for muskrat and mud-turtles instead of hunting for Rocky Mountain eagles, always for something mean instead of something grand. They look at their neighbors' imperfections through a microscope, and look at their own imperfections through telescope upside down. Twenty faults of their own do not hurt them so much as one fault of somebody else. The neighbors' imperfections are like gnats and they strain them out; their own imperfections are like camels and they swallow them.

Heavenly Reminiscences

—I WANT to hear some of the Bible passages read heaven after we have gathered up our dead children—I want to hear these passages read, and want to point them out, the passages that comforted us on the day of interment. When we meet our friends in heaven we will want to talk over the trials of this life, and say, "Those were the promises that cheered us." I want to hear David with his own voice read "The Lord is my Shepherd." I want in heaven to hear Paul read, "Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." I want to hear the archangel play Paul's Grand March of the Resurrection with the sar trumpet with which he woke the dead. Oh, blessed Book Good enough for earth, good enough for heaven. When have no griefs to be solaced, when I have no sins to be pardoned, when I have no hope of heaven to be enkindled that will be the day, and that the hour, and that the minute I will give up the Bible. Book of life, Book of comfort, Book of God, Book bespattered with the blood of the martyrs who died in its defense. Book sprinkled with the tears of a Christian ministry who were comforted by its promises. Dear old Book!

Two Orchestras

—THE GREAT temple of nature has two orchestras, the orchestra of Revelation and the orchestra of Science. The orchestra of Revelation has its musical instruments strung, and it is ready for a burst of eternal accord. Science is only stringing its instruments. You will have to wait, after a while it will be as in some of those cathedrals in Germany where they have an organ at one end of the cathedral and an organ at the other end, and they respond to each other; and, so it will be in the great temple of the universe the orchestra of Revelation and the orchestra of Science will respond to each other, and into one wreath will be twisted the Rose of Sharon and the laurel of scholarly achievement, and the roar of the ocean will be the magnificent bass of the temple worshipers, and the earth itself will be found to be only the pedals of a great organ of which the heavens are the keyboard.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

In Memory of the Brave

DECORATION DAY in New York this year, will long be memorable as the day on which the magnificent memorial to the soldiers and sailors of the State who fell in the Civil War was unveiled. The beautiful structure stands on Riverside Drive, near Ninth street, and is in full view from the river. It is in the form of a Grecian temple one hundred feet high. The base is of pink granite, on which rest twelve Corinthian columns of Dorset marble, each thirty-five feet high. They support an entablature of rich cresting surmounted by a conical roof. A bronze door on the south side admits the visitor to a high vaulted chamber surrounded by niches for the preservation of battle flags. The circular platform surrounding the monument is one hundred feet in diameter, the whole presenting a classic and graceful appearance. The cost of it was $300,000. Mayor Low, on behalf of the citizens of New York, received the monument from the committee, and transferred it to the President of the Park Board, with the injunction to "See to it that it receives the affectionate care due to a monument whose foundations are laid deep in the hearts of the people." Gen. O. O. Howard read a lengthy paper on the achievements of the men the monument was designed to commemorate. The flag which covered its face was stripped away, the wind aiding in the process, and the monument stood forth in all its beauty. Its appearance was greeted by a salute of guns from the shore batteries and from the warship Alabama, which was stationed on the river, while the spectators, led by a band, sang, "Nearer, My God, to Thee." No word was spoken derogatory of the brave men who fought on the other side in the great struggle or that could revive the antipathies of that conflict. It was rather such a memorial of peace and fraternity as that erected beside Jordan in ancient days when the two sections of Israel laid aside their arms, and the words then uttered would have been appropriate to this modern ceremony:

That it may be a witness between us and you, and our generations after us, that we might do the service of the Lord (Joshua 22: 27).

Heirship Renounced

A singular instance of the power of superstition is reported from Indianapolis, Ind. It was disclosed through the death of a man by injuries received in a railroad accident near that city. He was removed to a hospital, but it was soon realized that his recovery was impossible. He insisted on knowing if there was any hope, and being assured there was not, he requested the presence of some legal authority to whom he could make a confession. When the coroner was sent to him, he said that he was a fugitive from justice. A year ago, he had killed his own father, and being sure that suspicion would fall on him, he absconded, and had never been caught. Though his father possessed considerable property, he had never ventured to claim it. The next day after making his confession, he died. Inquiries were made, and it was found that the murder had taken place as he said, and the property had been lodged with the clerk of the county. The next heirs were notified of the fugitive's death, and invited to put in claim for the money. To the surprise of all, they refused to take any step to prove their claim. They said the money was "blood money"; the son had acquired it by murder, though he had never held it, and they would not receive it as his heirs. It would bring misfortune on any one who gained it." It is likely to remain in the clerk's hands so long as they hold to that belief. Few people so situated would be so superstitious. If they would study God's word they would realize that the stain is not on the money, but on the soul of him whose crime brought it to his inheritance.

Unto the pure all things are pure; but unto them that are defiled, is nothing pure; even their mind and conscience is defiled (Titus 1: 15).

Indifferent to Danger

A remarkable instance of indifference to danger is reported by passengers who have just reached New Orleans from Guatemala. The government of that country has decided to remove the population of Quezaltenango, a city which was recently shaken by an earthquake, to a new site, and to rebuild the city at a place ten miles distant. All the buildings in the town were so wrecked by the earthquake that it would be dangerous to allow the population to return. Notwithstanding the fact that walls in every street are tottering and threaten to fall at any moment, two thousand of the natives cling to mit, a coupling rod broke, and nine cars dashed down the incline at a frightful velocity. The man threw himself flat on the top of the car he happened to be on, and steadied himself by clinging to a projecting bar, while he braced his feet against the ledge of the car. Every moment the speed appeared to increase. When near Edgemont, three of the cars plunged from the track and crashed into a water tank and two small buildings, completely demolishing them. The cars were wrecked and their contents scattered for a considerable distance. The remaining six cars, with the brakeman still aboard, continued their fast flight down the mountain to Hagerstown, where they finally came to a standstill. The distance covered by the runaways was twenty miles, and it is asserted by railroad men that the time consumed in making the trip was but a fraction over ten minutes. The cars by their own momentum attained a speed which the mightiest locomotive has never reached; but they were on the key the man offered the elephant the empty glass. She took it as usual, but was disappointed at finding it empty. Her annoyance was increased by the man touching her nostrils with the lighted end of a cigar he was smoking. He was warned by one of the attendants that the animal was getting into an ugly temper, but he continued to tease her until, wrapping her trunk around him, she threw him down and trampled him to death. It was done in a moment, before anyone could go to his rescue, and the elephant rolled his dead body away from her, as if in contempt. He had paid a fearful penalty for his temerity. He would not have been so foolish if he had not previously toyed with the monster of intemperance, which is as strong and relentless as his slayer.

Fools, because of their transgression and because of their iniquities, are afflicted (Ps. 107: 17).

An Unclassified Court

An applicant to the United States Circuit Court in New York was referred recently to a court which is not included in the legal list of any State. The applicant, through his attorney, stated that he had just undergone a critical operation, and his life depended on his being able to get undisturbed sleep. But the house next door to the one in which he was lying ill had been pulled down, and a gentleman residing in Chicago had bought the site and had instructed a contractor to prepare the ground for the erection of a house. This involved blasting the rock. An appeal had been made to the Chicago man to postpone the blasting for a few days until the invalid had passed the crisis of his illness, but he had refused and had ordered the contractor to proceed with the work. The invalid's friends, therefore, asked the Court for an injunction restraining the contractor from obeying his employer. Judge Lacombe expressed regret that the Court could not grant it. He said that the proper court for such an appeal was "the court of common humanity," not to legal tribunals. He could not believe that any man would be so destitute of common humanity as to disregard such an appeal, but if he was so destitute there was no remedy at law. Neither was there remedy in the court to which the judge referred the appeal, as had already been proved. Common humanity is apt to be a selfish and inconsiderate principle until it has been transformed by divine power.

Hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the spirit which he hath given us (1. John 3: 24).

BRIEF NOTES

The number of immigrants received during May this year reached the enormous total of 92,485.

The recent census in Belgium, shows that in a population of six millions, there are only thirty thousand Protestants.

The Dutch Reformed Church in its recent general synod at Baltimore, after a long discussion, voted against taking any steps to revise its standard, the Heidelberg Catechism.

The Library Correspondent of the New York Herald, writing from England on the extraordinary depression in the book trade, says that it does not appear to have affected the sale of Bibles. No less than four million copies, he finds, were sold last year.

In the course of a recent address, a New York clergyman humorously called attention to the fact that business methods had been gradually entering the field of religion in a regrettable form. Men were to a large extent holding their religion as they did their property, in the names of their wives.

Mrs. Spurgeon, widow of the late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, having recently lost the swan which used to swim on the lake in her garden, to which her late husband was greatly attached, desired to replace it. Hearing that the king was reducing the number of his swans, she applied to the proper officer for permission to purchase one. She received in reply a letter from the king's secretary, stating that his majesty, having learned that she was the widow of the late famous preacher, would be glad to present her with the swan.

the present ruins in spite of the efforts of the government to dislodge them, but the rest of the population will move. The new site is on a broad tableland midway between two mountain ranges and has seldom felt earthquake shocks. It is thought that at least 26,000 people will settle there, but the others can be taken away only by force. Many who would pity such people in requiring force to save them from destruction, are themselves guilty of like folly, in turning a deaf ear to the pleadings and warnings of preachers and Christian workers, and even to Him who died to save them.

Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life (John 5: 40).

A Perilous Ride

A brakeman on the Western Maryland Railroad is slowly recovering from a nervous shock produced by a perilous ride. He was on a freight car attached to a train which was climbing the Blue Ridge Mountains. As it approached the sum-down grade, which is so easy to travel. Unhappily, it is so in life; it is easy to go downward to destruction, but a man never rises in the Christian life, unless he strives earnestly and is aided by Christ.

Strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able (Luke 13: 24).

Killed by an Elephant

A tragedy occurred in a circus exhibiting in Brooklyn, N. Y., on May 28, as the result of a foolish act of temerity. A man, who was a hanger-on of the circus though not a regular employee, entered the elephant quarters early in the morning. He had not fully slept off the effects of a previous night's debauch, and had procured a glass of whiskey, which he carried in his hand. He went to the largest of the elephants, famous for her dexterity in taking a glass with her trunk from the hand of her keeper and pouring its contents into her huge mouth without spilling a drop. OUR INDIA ORPHAN WAIFS

.....Cheering Letters from Grateful Missionaries

AMONG the reports which the missionaries in India have sent of the condition of the famine-orphan who, through the liberality of our readers, are being trained for Christ, is one from Dr. Mansell, of Bijnor, in the North West Provinces, which is of special interest. During the famine of 1897, Dr. Mansell labored indefatigably in relieving the appalling suffering in his district. At the close of the long and bitter struggle, he, like other missionaries, had a number of orphans on his hands, whom he did not know how to support. Through the generous gifts of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, provision was made for a large number of these for three years, thus relieving Dr. Mansell's mind of a problem of a difficult and painful character.

Among the girls thus provided for, was a bright child of about twelve years, to whom the name of Martha was given. Most of the orphans were much younger than she, but she was such a miserable little creature when she was received, that she looked younger than she really was. She had been deserted by her parents, and had suffered so terribly from starvation that it was doubtful whether her life could be saved. She was a mere skeleton, dirty and ravenously hungry. A few days made a wonderful change in her appearance. It was then seen that she had great natural beauty and quick intelligence. She proved teachable, but by virtue of her seniority she inclined to matronly offices toward the smaller girls, rather than to study. Her tact in managing them, her patience and kindness won their hearts, and Martha soon became like a little mother to the crowd of orphan girls in the school.

An Orphan Married

Five years have passed since Martha was received, and during the whole time she has proved a treasure to the Orphanage. In the care of the children's clothes, in looking after the conduct of the little ones in the play-ground and in attending to the sick, she has abundantly repaid the care bestowed upon her and has developed into a comely, intelligent young woman. Dr. Mansell was pleased with her. But other eyes than his had observed her, and from a different standpoint. One of the converts of the mission, a thriving young farmer of Moradabad, named Dassi, surprised Dr. Mansell recently with a request for permission to marry Martha. He was evidently deeply in earnest about it, and when Dr. Mansell questioned the girl, he found that the young people were both of one mind. He was reluctant to part with her, but he could not but approve of the young man's taste, and there could not be any doubt that she would have a comfortable home and would make an excellent wife.

The wedding had just been celebrated when Dr. Mansell wrote. He had given some articles of furniture and some cooking utensils as Martha's dowry, and the bridegroom had furnished money at his own urgent request, with which suitable clothing for the bride had been purchased. It was a general holiday in the Orphanage, but not all of joy. The little ones wept at losing their friend, and Martha, though happy in her prospect, could not keep back her own tears at the parting. It was all over at last and the bride and bridegroom set off in the ox-cart for their home. "It was a pretty sight," Dr. Mansell says—"only a drop in the sea of India's teeming millions, but that drop was one of happiness. Some one's gift made it possible, for without that gift, Martha's life could not have been saved."

Industrial Education

It is gratifying to learn that special efforts are being made to fit both boys and girls for a career independent of the land. The misfortune of India has been that so many of the people depend on the harvests for their support, so that when the monsoon fails, and there is no harvest, so large a proportion of the population have no means of support. By teaching the boys trades, and the girls the lighter kind of manufacture, precautions are taken against the famines that are recurrent in India. One report that has been received from Dr. H. Fairbank, the American Board's missionary at Vadala, in the Ahmednagar district, shows the character of the education which is being given.

"We, have from the first, considered that industrial training was to be steadily kept in view for these wards of ours," says Dr. Fairbank in a personal letter to Dr. Klopsch, "and the industries suited for them are being carefully considered, while some of them are already in successful operation. The rug factory, for their board and clothing and other necessities." At Aligarh a wonderful work is being done with the orphans. The accompanying picture shows the building in which they are sheltered. It accommodates 338 boys, all of whom are famine orphans. Of these, 62 are supported by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund.

THE GREAT ORPHANAGE AND MISSION SCHOOL FOR BOYS AT ALIGARH, INDIA which you have seen yourself, is at present asking for more hands.

"Lately, there has been a boom in the metal-hammering department of the Ahmednagar school, and 120 boys are to be set to work. As you know, the work is embossing copper and brass dishes with artistic designs.

"Mr. Churchill is making plans to start weaving cloth on improved hand-looms. This is a great industry in India. Another industry at present in operation on a small scale, is the making of nets of all descriptions from cotton twine. Hammocks, netted bags for money, etc., are in constant demand, and a number of boys are now earning their living in this industry.

"This statement will show you that we are not simply teaching our orphans to read and write, but that we are fitting them to take their part in the industrial revival which is now beginning in all parts of India."

Dr. R. A. Hume, who is doing the same kind of work, desires us to express his most grateful thanks to our readers who have undertaken the support of orphans in his institution. He is in a position to appreciate their generosity, for he adds: "I have done my best to raise money for the support of the boys and girls we have, in addition to those provided for by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, but with limited success. Every such experiment illustrates anew the great helpfulness of your service. My main reliance is the money which comes through you for about eighty girls in my wife's school and about forty boys in my own. All the missionaries have children in their institutions who would surely prove useful members of society, if money could be furnished to support them. They have no funds available for the purpose, and it is only a question of time before they must cease the struggle to keep them, unless the Christians at home come to their succor. It will be a most deplorable thing if these children, who are being trained under Christian auspices, have to be abandoned for lack of the few dollars which are indispensable

Scandinavian journal of Chicago, which has loyally advocated the cause of the poor little waifs of India.

As our readers are aware, the cost of supporting an orphan in a missionary school for a year is only fifty dollars. For this sum the child is fed, clothed and taught not only a trade but the principles of Christianity. Large numbers of the elder children have already given evidence of conversion. They will go forth at the end of their school course to carry the light of the Gospel into the cities and villages of India, reaching circles of society that the white missionary cannot enter.

Have you an Orphan in India?

Any person or Sunday School, or Young People's Society can undertake the support of one of these orphans by sending fifteen dollars to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The denomination of the missionary can be selected by the donor, so that the child will be brought up under the auspices of a missionary of a denomination, as the preference of the donor is always respected. On receipt of the money, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD communicates with a missionary of the denomination designated and an orphan is thereupon assigned to the donor. The child becomes an adopted child of the persons who furnish its support, and the missionary who has charge of the child writes at regular intervals to the foster-parents, reporting the condition and progress of the child. Many parents who have lost children, and many whose hearts have been touched by the hapless fate of the little orphans, have found in the thought that a little one whom they have never seen is being trained for Christ at their expense by devoted Christian workers ten thousand miles away. Christ said to those who undertake such work: "Thou shalt not recompense thee, but thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just."

We are glad to learn from hundreds of our correspondents, who have undertaken the support of orphans, that a blessing has come to their own souls through the work they are doing. Such expressions as the following occur in hundreds of letters:

"I am thankful for this privilege of being able to do such work in foreign lands. I am thankful to God that he has put it into hearts of Christian men, as the owners of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to open such a miraculous way of being a foreign missionary even here in our 'home-land.' We cannot go there in person, can do as much, sometimes more, by our prayers and our money, and I am glad to say, that, as I am the correspondent of their two joint pledges, that we mean to continue our support for this year, God helping us."

"It is a grand and noble work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing, and I thank God that I am blessed with the privilege of helping just a little. I wish you every success in your great work."

"I received a letter from Rev. R. Ward, and he says that the orphan I am supporting, with a number of others, have become converted and have joined the church. God has already repaid me for what little I have done, and is answering my prayers continually."

"We are proud to join in such a noble work, and feel that it will be blessed. The report is very encouraging and gratifying indeed."

THE SPELL OF AVLD LANG SYNE

FOR ourselves we do not realize the flight of time," said the minister's wife, as she came over the lawn—a gracious figure in her rich, black silk and sheer white cap. The minister was sitting in an easy chair reading a learned book. He rose to meet his wife, and stood till she had taken her favorite rocker and produced her knitting. Perceiving that she wanted to talk, he put his big volume down on the wicker table. These people were old, but they were not infirm. Both wore an air of enjoying life, and unlike many who have grown to old age in the service of the church, they were very well-to-do. The lawn was their favorite summer resort of an afternoon, but today it was all ready for a party; rugs were spread on the soft green grass, chairs were placed here and there, and a harp stood in the shadow of the vines on the veranda.

"Elsie has her harp ready," said Dr. Van Elten, "and you are in your prettiest gown and looking very sweet, my dear. Why that reflection about the flight of time?"

"Well, I was looking over an old drawer while ago, to find a cameo pin that you gave me when we were engaged, and I came suddenly upon this." She handed her husband an old-fashioned picture in a case, a picture called an ambrotype; it presented a very beautiful girl, with hair in great puffs on either side a laughing face. Her gown, rather low in the neck, revealed a charming throat, and her hand held a roll of music.

Dr. Van Elten looked at it with interest. "Oh, don't you remember sweet Alice, Ben Bolt, sweet Alice, whose hair was so brown?"

He murmured his wife, as her eyes met his. "Sweet Alice, whose hair is so white, is just as lovely," he said gallantly. "We've had great fun in growing old together, dearest. Though to tell the plain truth, I never know that I am old, until I meet some friend whom I have not seen for years. Then it comes over me, and I'm just like you; you resent it, and would turn the clock back if you could. I feel the tender spell of 'Auld Lang Syne,' and it really makes me happy. The evening of today is so very, very pleasant."

They were interrupted by an arriving group of guests. Their neighbors were all dining, by twos and threes, the doctor, the linker, the lawyer, the merchant, and their wives and daughters. There was an absent-minded man, who was supposed to be a poet, and an alert spick-and-span gentleman, who came in an automobile and who was a famous artist. Elsie's young friends came, and the garden party was presently in full swing.

Maids set little tables about, and present refreshments were served—thin sandwiches, cakes, ice cream, lemonade and coffee. Elsie's harp tinkled musically from the veranda. There was much cheery laughter, and then the party detached itself into two sections, the younger ones encamping in and around a summer-house that was embowered in roses, and the older ones surrounding Mrs. Van Elten's chair.

"Just before you joined us this afternoon, Doctor Gray," said Mrs. Van Elten. "My husband and I were discussing that foe who conquers all by slow sieges, that foe who always wins the little in the end, old Time. I, for one, hate him more and more. I wonder if woman are apt to dislike growing old more than men. What do you think?"

"I," said the doctor with emphasis, "never generalize. Some women have reason to dread Time, others do not. When a woman is as charming to her latest birthday as some in the present company, she should regard Time as her friend."

"I never knew that I cared about it at all," said Mrs. Bersley, a visiting grandmother, "till I heard a young girl's reason for giving me a seat in a street car. 'I never can sit, while an old lady stands.' That hurt me."

"I sympathize with you," replied Mr. Van Elten. "When people offer me courtesies, evidently because they observe my gray hairs, I am always vexed."

"Ladies," said the lawyer, "you both have hit upon one symptom of increasing years. Sensitiveness on the score of age is a sure sign, but the most convincing sign of all is living in the past. Reminiscent people are certainly old; the young dwell in to-day. They are intensely, earnestly, actively interested in the present."

"Mother," called Elsie, "there is a splendid sunset. Won't you all come and look at it?"

Mrs. Van Elten rose. As she passed her husband, she said to him in a low voice, divining an intention on his part:

"Keep that ambrotype in your pocket. Let none see it."

THEY'RE JUST LOVELY

Lovely? Yes, the little birdlings are most beautiful and dear. But the darlings bent above them make the sunshine of our year. Childhood's sweetness, tender ruth, and the lovely soul of truth.

They watched the sunset, gorgeous, grand, magnificent. Great heaps of gold and amber were piled in the western sky. No hour of the day was half so exquisite. It seemed as if the sunset gathered to itself all the radiance and glory of the whole twenty-four hours.

"A Christian's life should be like that!" said the minister.

A Manifest Duty

Before making up your mind hear both sides of a question. Some people go off explosively before they have listened to one side. The sensible person reserves a decision until fully informed, and until she is calm enough to balance pros and cons.

Family Likeness

I THINK the sweetest thing in the world is family likeness. You meet a woman, or a man. You are reminded by a gesture, a trick of manner, or an inflection, of somebody else, and presently you discover that there was a kinship, a relationship of blood, unto the third and fourth generation; it does not fade. Recently, on a crowded excursion train, one stranger watched another. "That girl," she said to her companion, "looks like Molly C., when her face is in repose. When she smiles she is exactly like Miriam C. I'm going over to get acquainted with her."

"Why, Aunt Eleanor!" exclaimed her niece, "pray don't. It's quite unlikely that the C's of Maine should have a relation on this train, away out in Montana." "I shall find out," stubbornly said the older woman. After a time she returned triumphant. "She's Helen C.," she said, "of New York. Fourth or fifth cousin, but a C., with the same eyes, the same jaw, the same coloring of the clan. And I've claimed friendship with her, because she's a C."

The likeness that subtly and elusively runs through the physical form of a family, runs as mysteriously and relentlessly through their spirits; they are grave and dour, they are blithe and inconsequent, they are sober or sad, they are alike from generation to generation. Insanity crops out in families, baffling every precaution to prevent its fatal weird, but so, thank heaven, does sanity. Mental poise and balance are transmitted as surely as their opposite. It's a great thing to have had godly forbears, to be a "child of parents passed into the skies." For, if the sins of the fathers descend unto the children, so do the virtues of the fathers, and heredity is as potential for good as for evil, in many a race.

But there is, let us remember with reverence, a stranger thing than heredity, and that is, divine pity, and divine mercy and love. Because his compassions fail not, many a man is reclaimed from and triumphs over the miseries that might have been his woeful handicap through inheritance. Ever let us put our trust in the One who is strong to save, whose goodness never ceases, and who cares sleeplessly for the children of men.

IF I WERE YOU

I wouldn't worry, if I were you,
It may rain to-day, but to-morrow's sky
Will be swept of clouds that obscure the blue;
There's sure to be sunlight by and by.

I wouldn't hurry, if I were you,
Plenty of time the good Lord sends,
You can finish your task ere the day is through
And you needn't leave it with ravelled ends.

Gossip

A great deal is said against gossip as if it were necessarily a very bad thing. Slander and scandal are intolerably bad, but gossip may be kindly. One can hardly live in this world and not take some interest in one's neighbors. If one of the children across the street has scarlet fever or measles, every family living near is interested, not merely for fear of contagion, but through genuine regret that the child is suffering and sincere hope that she may get well. If John Drum, who went to college last year, sweeps the board with all the prizes, we all talk about him, because we are as proud as if he were our own boy. Gossip that is the repetition of good news, or the expression of sympathy, is a perfectly proper thing and lends a wholesome spice to life.

The Needle's Eye

A NEW SERIAL STORY
WRITTEN EXPRESSLY
BY FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY

CHRISTIAN
HERALD

Chapter XXXI. — Hilda Makes a New Friend

LET no one make the mistake of supposing that Hilda Rossi was guilty of deliberate hypocrisy. This wonderful, terrible human nature of ours holds within itself the coldness of the rock, the immobile selfishness of the vegetable, the pitiless greed and cunning of the beast enfolded, sheath-like, about that unchanging spark of the divine which abides in every soul—the true and only source of its being.

Hilda was selfish as a seedling oak—or a baby—with whom selfishness is at once the law of being and of preservation. The flame burned as yet in the sealed crypt of her unguessed self. Her mind was tranquil; her health perfect; her cunning quite unperceived by herself, so much a part of herself did it seem. The altruistic idea had not yet presented itself to her consciousness in any compelling form. To deny self—to overcome, these were meaningless sounds in her ears. She was not a hypocrite; she was perfectly sincere and true to herself as she knew that self.

And because one does not easily perceive in another that which has ceased to exist in one's self, Immanuel, who had climbed to a higher plane, and in whom love ruled, saw in his young wife the ideal woman. The vague soreness and disappointment which settled down upon him like a cloud as he left her that afternoon, he attributed to his own lack of perception. "I have expected too much of her," he said to himself. "I must be patient."

Hilda was glad to be left to herself; she was feeling pleasantly languid after the exertions and emotions of the morning. She therefore settled herself by the window, determined to enjoy uninterruptedly the pageant of the city street, which impressed her as being delightfully exciting. As her eyes followed the unending stream of cars, carriages, and people, she smiled with unmeaning triumph. "I just wish Amelia Hurd could see me now," she said to herself, and twisted the diamond on her finger so that patches of brilliant color played upon her gown. "Wouldn't she be jealous, though!"

A carriage was drawing up before the entrance below; she leaned forward to stare at its occupant, a stout, richly-dressed lady, as she stepped slowly out. "My!" she murmured, "wouldn't it be lovely to have a carriage like that, and go everywhere I liked, to the stores, and the theatre, and—!" She paused in the current of her meditations to wonder where people who had carriages did go anyway. Her knowledge of fashionable life was extremely limited, consisting mainly of vague but magnificent visions of trailing gowns, blazing jewels, and an unlimited variety of good things to eat. Hilda was something of a gourmand in an inexperienced way; she was eating bonbons out of a pasteboard box with childish relish.

A knock at the door brought first a surprised stare, then a stereotyped "Come in!" in a high girlish treble. The knock was repeated, and with a little exclamation of vexation she crossed the room and opened the door. A servant stood without holding a salver, which, in its turn, held a small square of white pasteboard.

"Shall I show the lady up, ma'am?" Hilda glanced uncertainly toward the mirror. "Yes, of course," she said in a tone of haughty condescension. "Show her up at once."

"Mrs. Caleb Smalley," she read; "why it must be that lawyer's wife. I wonder if I ought to say anything about the silver." Her little fingers trembled with agitation as she fastened up a stray lock of yellow hair and pulled the ribbons higher about her white throat. She decided in the interval that elapsed before a second knock announced her visitor, that as this person was the wife of a man in her husband's employ, a toplofty demeanor would be both elegant and suitable. But her confidence was somewhat dashed by the imposing individual who rustled forward with outstretched hand.

Mrs. Caleb Smalley was tall and portly; she was attired with the magnificence which became the wife of one of New York's leading lawyers. Huge diamonds flashed from her large pink ears; plumes waved in stately luxuriance above her rotund countenance; satin, velvet, lace, fur and cloth blent in a bewildering costume, which effectually swept the last trace of arrogance from the blue eyes of her hostess.

"I came at once, my dear," exclaimed the lady, with ingratiating emphasis and profuse smiles, "the very moment I heard you were here. Why did you not let us know at once?"

Hilda stammered out a few words to the effect that they had come quite unexpectedly. She felt unpleasantly young and ignorant. What was worse, the gown

"Of course you could, my dear!" echoed her visitor, swiftly modifying at least one of her previous impressions. "There is no earthly reason why you shouldn't have houses in a dozen places. You must pardon me if I talk like a mother to you, my dear; of course, we have known all about Mr. Rossi's affairs so long, and I assure you that Mr. Smalley loves him as a father does his son—just like a father!"

"You are very good, I am sure," said Hilda prettily. She had begun to feel the ground under her feet once more, and was proportionately herself again.

"Mr. Smalley has been trying for a long time to persuade Mr. Rossi to invest more largely in city real estate," pursued Mrs. Smalley, with another of her expansive smiles, accompanied by arching brows and nodding plumes. "We should so love to have you near us! There is a perfect love of a house for sale now, not three blocks and your husband will dine with us en famille to-morrow evening, I hope."

Hilda wondered a little over the French words, but answered cautiously that she would be most happy if her husband had made no other plans. "Perhaps he intends to go home," she added, with doubtful glance at the benign curves of Mrs. Smalley's high-colored visage.

"Not to-morrow!" cried that lady. "Why, we haven't seen anything of you yet! Oh, these men! My dear, you will have to take a few lessons of an experienced matron like myself in the art of getting your own way. I shouldn't say this," she added, "if it wasn't far better for them—the men, I mean. Left to themselves they sometimes have such strange notions. Now dear Mr. Rossi was brought up exclusively by a man—his uncle; dare say you have heard all about him."

Hilda admitted that she knew very little about Mr. Moses Armitage. Her bright eyes were fastened on the face of her hostess with an eagerness which did not escape that vigilant lady.

"You won't think me unpardonably rude, I trust, if I say to you quite in confidence, my dear, that Mr. Armitage was a man of the most unfortunately erratic turn of mind. It was most unfortunate for poor, dear Mr. Rossi! My husband has told me over and over again, that never in the whole course of his legal practice has he met with a person so-so misguided. Poor Mr. Rossi was devoted to him, and I presume, never even suspected with what injustice he was treated. Mr. Armitage was his sole guardian, you know, and he actually denied the child all the advantages due to his position as heir of the immense Armitage estate. Why, the poor boy never knew that he was anything but a penniless orphan until he was almost of age. They lived in tenement houses, and—"

"He told me about that," murmured Hilda.

"And what did you think of it?" "I thought it was ridiculous," said Hilda, decidedly.

"My dear! I am so relieved to hear you say that!" exclaimed Mrs. Smalley, pressing the other's hand fondly in both her own. "I have told you that Mr. Smalley is devoted to your husband—that he loves him like a father. He has been so distressed to see Mr. Armitage's unfortunate influence actually blighting what would otherwise be a most brilliant career. But you can save him. I see that you will."

Hilda was somewhat puzzled; but she felt an agreeable sympathy with her own half-fledged ambitions, which prompted her to say: "I don't think I quite understand. What is it that I must save him from, Mrs. Smalley?"

"Hasn't he told you about his tenements? Poor, dear man, he has such a sweet nature, and of course is the most easily led away by his sympathies," Mr. Smalley heaved a deep sigh and arched her brows pityingly.

"I went this morning to a tenement house, if that is what you call it," replied Hilda. "The most dreadful place, full of dirty children and crying women, and smells—ugh! it made me quite ill!" Hilda described the home which she had seen from the landing—the untidy woman with the sewing machine and the wretched children. "It gave me a shock," she said.

"Of course it did! I could see at a glance, my love, that you are so exquisitely organized that you could not endure anything of the kind. That is just the way with me. I really cannot bear the sight of suffering! I always tell my husband to keep any horrors out of my way. If one could help it; but, of course, that is utterly impossible. There are these dreadfully poor people of the masses, and there always will be. I hold that it is my Christian duty to keep myself bright and cheerful that I may act the part of wife and mother as I should. I must really demonstrate with Mr. Rossi seriously."

HILDA DESCRIBED THE SCENE SHE HAD VIEWED FROM THE LANDING of which she had felt so sure, had become on the instant "countrified," than which there was no more repulsive adjective in Hilda's vocabulary.

"When Mr. Smalley sent me word, not an hour since, that you were here, and probably at home," continued Mrs. Smalley, "I lost not an instant, but ordered the carriage at once. I said to myself, 'I know dear Mrs. Rossi will pardon me if I come sans ceremonie.' We have so hoped that your husband would bring you up to town. Of course, the country is charming in summer time—perfectly charming; I love the country! But for winter, you know, there is really no place on earth like New York. We prefer it to Paris, London, or any of the foreign capitals!" The lady paused to flash a particularly gracious smile at the young woman opposite, whom she had already classified as a hopelessly timid and awkward country beauty, with neither birth nor breeding.

Subtly aware of her visitor's conclusions, and filled with helpless wrath thereat, Hilda straightened her small head defiantly. "My husband prefers the country," she said, with a curl of her ripe lips. "Of course, we could live anywhere we chose."

from us, in the most fashionable quarter. It is really a providential opportunity!"

"I should like to live in New York," said Hilda, her blue eyes sparkling with new interest. "I should be perfectly happy here, I know, but—"

"Then why do you say 'but,' my dear?" demanded the other, with a playful little gesture, expressive of the fondest intimacy, "I am sure Mr. Rossi must be already completely at the beck and call of that dainty little hand. Besides, it would be so much better for him; so many of his interests are here."

"That does not signify, I am sure," Mrs. Smalley was saying smoothly. "It is a small estate, is it not?"

"No," said Hilda carelessly, "it is a large place; but I don't care much for the neighborhood. It is rather lonely, I mean," she concluded, again fixing envious eyes upon the appointments of her visitor's toilet.

This exquisitely beautiful Mrs. Rossi could be quickly run through the social mould; she would come out—Mrs. Smalley easily foresaw—a finished society woman. The rest was easy, and the glory would be hers. She initiated the educational process with her next remark. "You

A Remarkable Bible Class

Fifty Years Faithful Christian Service.
What One Business Man Accomplished

FOR more than half a century there has gone forth from a single Bible Class in the Presbyterian Church of Frankfort, Ohio, a stream of life and power whose influence has been felt in many parts of the country, and never will be summed up until the great reckoning day. This is a remarkable Bible Class; not remarkable in size, for it never has been large; indeed, it has only enrolled 259 members during its entire existence of over fifty years. Nor is it remarkable because of the brilliancy and reputation of its teacher, though he possesses both.

Mr. D. C. Anderson has passed the "Serious Sixties" and is in the mellow "Sacred Seventies," which Joseph Cook used to speak about; yet he is full of life and vigor. In 1839 he, with his wife, went to the World's Sunday School Convention in London, England, and they expect to attend the Tenth International Sunday School Convention at Denver, Colo., June 26-30 of this year. When the nineteenth century was just half gone, Mr. Anderson took up his work of teaching this Bible Class, and he has continued in unbroken service ever since, with the exception of one year spent in the army. An active business man, merchant and banker, he yet finds time not only to do the work connected with his class, but to participate in an active way in the life of the church generally.

Over twenty-seven hundred Sabbaths have passed since he taught his first lesson to this class, and of these he has been absent only eleven Sabbaths on account of sickness, and seventy-six because of absence from home—never once because of the weather! The remarkable thing about this class is that it has maintained an unbroken class life, with frequent reunions and anniversary occasions, from the very first.

It was the writer's privilege to attend one of these gatherings, when an immense group picture was taken of the members of the class who were present, together with a large number of their children and some grandchildren. Mr. Anderson has kept an accurate record of each member of the class from the beginning, and has issued it recently in pamphlet form. Rarely has anything been seen so accurate or complete in the way of Sunday School biography as this. We give a few samples to show what completeness the work was done, and how carefully every item of interest is recorded:

George A. Hartman was enrolled July 5, 1852, was a graduate of the Ohio Medical College, Cincinnati, Class of '74, and at Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York, Class of '74, and is now a her lithe and active form, and after months of suffering, the messenger came October 10, 1888, but to her it was no terror, for trusting and leaning upon the almighty arm of her Saviour, she passed over and entered the heavenly Canaan.

Biographical sketches like these are kept, in permanent form, of all the members of the class. They are now to be found in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Colorado, Iowa, Dakota, Washington, Florida, California, Nebraska, Minnesota, Kentucky, West Virginia, Arkansas. From the class have gone forth nine ministers, fourteen physicians, two dentists, six lawyers, fifty-four farmers, fifteen merchants, twenty-five mechanics, three drug gists, one judge, two prosecuting attorneys, and many in other walks of life. Forty-four members were in the Civil War. Of the two hundred and fifty-nine enrolled members, one hundred and ninety-nine, or seventy-seven per cent, are members of Christian churches. One hundred and thirty are Presbyterians, fifty Methodists, while the Baptists, Congregationalists, Lutherans and United Brethren are represented among the rest. There are nine Sunday School superintendents and thirty-one teachers in the company. Of the ninety-four young women who were enrolled in the class, eighty-seven are professing Christians.

The pastor of this church, Rev. Dr. George James Jones, said in a recent sermon, "The history of this church is the history of Mr. Anderson, and the history of Mr. Anderson is the history of this church. The community of Frankfort, the Presbyterian Church, as well as Mr. Anderson are to be congratulated for such a record. Who can estimate fully the moral force of the consecrated service of this one servant of God? Ages to come, yes, the eternities will be richer because of this pure stream, which has gone forth to make glad the city of God." MARION LAWRENCE.

Volcanic Dust at Barbados

FROM the Rev. C. T. Oehler, of the Moravian Church at Bridgetown, Barbados, W. I. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a letter telling of the terror in that section in consequence of the volcanic outbreaks on Martinique and St. Vincent. Pastor Oehler writes:

"I send you a little parcel of the dust, which, sent up into the air by the St. Vincent volcano, floated over this way, and fell upon the island of Barbados, about half an inch deep. A vessel that came into our port a day or two since, reports that it fell on her deck when 500 miles east of Barbados, and that the sea was covered with it at that distance. Hence the dust had floated eastward 600 miles. It would have been no strange thing had it floated westward; but it was strange that it should have gone towards the rising sun, because it is just in that direction that our winds come from, and I felt no wind from the west that day.

"That Wednesday (of La Soufriere's eruption), was a remarkable day—the seventh of May. About 2 P. M. we heard what seemed to be a tremendous cannonading; a very dark cloud came up from the west and covered the whole sky. It came down closer and closer, and it grew darker, until at 5 P. M., when a fine grayish substance began to fall very thickly. People were very much frightened, and many began to weep. We spread out papers and gathered a quantity of it. The dust was very disagreeable—it was very light, and got into everything—eyes, ears, mouth, clothes were full of it. As we sat at dinner, it floated into the room and settled on food and dishes; it was useless to wipe a dish or to get a clean one, for in a moment it was covered again.

"It was our service evening, and I went down to our chapel, which seats 1,200, expecting to find no one, as it was so dark at seven o'clock you could scarcely find your way. But to my surprise, when I entered the doors I found quite a little gathering. We had a very spirited meeting and an earnest address.

"I am so proud that the United States has come so grandly forward with help for the distressed. I am proud of it, as I am a citizen of the United States. C. T. OEHLER."

CATCHING.

The Coffee Habit Breeds Trouble.

It is quite commonly the case that both husband and wife are somewhat similarly troubled with coffee drinking.

A lady writes and, after giving description of her husband's relief from coffee dyspepsia and general nervous trouble, says "I was almost as bad as he, having the headache nearly every day and was nervous and weak, did not sleep well, was pale and thin and had a bad complexion.

When I found how much good Postum Coffee was doing Husband I concluded to use it and I tell you life is altogether a different thing. I eat and sleep well and look like a different woman. My usual weight for years was from 98 to 100 pounds, I now weigh 108 pounds and everyone tells me how much better I am looking.

I had some friends who did not like Postum, but knowing it was because they did not boil it long enough I made some at their house one day, and they agree with me that Postum is a delicious beverage, and while, of course, the flavor and taste is pleasing and we are glad Postum does suit us that way, the great advantage is in the wonderful, bounding health that we have recovered." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

COOL FOOD

For Hot Days.

Better health comes with less meat and fat during the warm weather.

By proper and pleasant diet you can prepare the body for summer and feel from ten to twenty degrees cooler than your neighbor.

Grape-Nuts and cream, a little fruit and possibly a couple of soft boiled eggs, is sufficient for the breakfast. An ordinary portion of Grape-Nuts contains sufficient nourishment to fully sustain the body until the noonday meal; being a pre-digested food, it does not overtax the stomach and contains none of the heat supplied by the heavy carbonaceous foods.

Fully cooked at the factory by food experts, brings it to you ready to serve, and does away with the heat of cooking and the time necessary to prepare ordinary food and its crisp daintiness is pleasing to the palate of young and old.

Many delicious recipes are found in each Grape-Nuts package, so that the form of eating this wholesome food can be changed to suit the user.

These suggestions, if followed for ten days, will convince the most skeptical that a cool body, an active brain and an energy hitherto unknown will prevail and the general lassitude peculiar to warm weather will disappear.

NATIONAL PROSPERITY*

The True Tests of a Nation's Progress and Pre-eminence Among the Countries of the World

NEVER before in the history of our nation has prosperity come to us to the extent that it has this year.

We now occupy a position that makes us the envy of civilized peoples. Our agricultural products, our mineral wealth and our manufactures go now into the world's markets, to a degree unprecedented in our experience. In spite of the disadvantages of a protective tariff, which necessarily tends to restrict foreign trade, our exports increase from year to year, and our merchants are outrivalling those of older nations in the foreign markets. In new inventions, in the manufacture of machinery, and in the construction of railroads, bridges and public works, our citizens compete successfully with those of other lands, bringing enormous additions to the national wealth. Their enterprise, their restless energy, and their skill in effecting business combinations, have made our capitalists the wonder of the world. The number of our millionaires has multiplied, and those who were already millionaires, have added more millions to their hoard. And the prospect for the future is golden. Our prosperity is attracting vast numbers of immigrants, both capitalists and workers, who will undoubtedly still further increase our enterprises and our power of production, which will tend to the extension of our commerce.

If wealth alone were the measure of our well-being, we should have abundant reason to rejoice. It is a matter for congratulation in every patriotic soul; but with the nation as with the individual, it is not the sole test. Before we can pronounce a nation truly prosperous, we must take account of other qualities besides its bank balance. A nation's life, like a man's life, consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. There are men whose moral ruin begins with the acquisition of wealth, and become more dire as their riches increase. A similar danger may imperil a nation. Pride, and arrogance, and sinful luxury, and greed, and rivalry in extravagance, may so eat into the moral nature of a people as to render them vile. There may, too, come so voracious an appetite for wealth, which is apt to grow with its supply, that it may disregard the rights of its instruments. If the passion for the acquisition of wealth leads the capitalist to grind the faces of the poor, to keep back from his employees the share of the fruits of their united enterprise, which rightfully belongs to them, he becomes morally poor, and his money has the taint of fraud upon it. That would not be a prosperous nation in which there were only two classes—the men who had more money than they could ever spend, and the men who have not enough money for ordinary comfort.

The main question, however, which must be asked before we can pronounce a wealthy nation prosperous, is that which Moses indicated in the warning associated with the topic: "Beware lest thou forget the Lord." This is a danger to which we are peculiarly liable. Our eminence among the nations of the world is so largely due to the abilities of our citizens, their energy and skill, that there is a strong temptation to take to ourselves the credit, and to forget that it is God who giveth the power to get wealth. We are responsible to him, not only for the use to which we put our riches, but for the methods we adopt to increase them. God still rules in the affairs of men, and has his own methods of punishing those who transgress his laws. The self-made man, strong in his consciousness of mental power, and armed with enormous wealth, is apt to regard himself as self-sufficient, and to resent criticism of his conduct. If our capitalists, as a class, assumed that attitude, which tends to defiance of God and his laws, it would not be long before the power of God would be manifested in a way to make men tremble. He has punished nations before this, making them an example to the world. Persia, Greece and Rome, and the nations of antiquity, have fallen, powerful and wealthy as they were. If we disregard the righteousness which alone exalteth a nation, if we make money our idol and honor the millionaire, regardless of the methods by which he acquired his wealth, we shall offend God and incur his wrath.

A GREAT LIGHT QUENCHED

Dr. John Henry Barrows, President of Oberlin College, Called to His Reward

MANY Christian people of all denominations and many adherents of other faiths—Mohammedans, Hindus and Buddhists, will hear with sincere sorrow that the man who, above other Christians, they had learned to love, will speak to them on earth no more. These men felt that Dr. Barrows understood them, and with wide tolerance recognized the good that is in their natures, as well as in their creeds, and, while insisting with no dubious utterance on the superiority of Christianity to all other religions, had no word of condemnation for any sincere soul who differed with him.

THE LATE DR. JOHN HENRY BARROWS

Dr. Barrows became known the world over through the Parliament of Religions that he organized, which assembled in connection with the Chicago Fair in 1893. He invited representatives of every faith to meet in Chicago, assuring them of a courteous hearing.

Subsequently, Dr. Barrows visited India and Japan, lecturing more than a hundred times during his visit, presenting Christianity with great force as a religion destined to become world-wide, and showing how adherents of other faiths could find in it all that was best in their own creeds, without the impurities and contradictions which their most intelligent adherents admitted. It was skilfully done, and must have greatly aided the missionaries in their work.

Dr. Barrows was only fifty-five years old when his work on earth closed. He was a native of Medina, Mich., where his father was a minister. After studying at Yale, Union and Andover seminaries, he spent some time in mission work in Kansas. He then went on a tour in the Holy Land and in Europe, preaching for a time in the American chapel in Paris. After a brief ministry in Boston, he went to Chicago, where he threw himself vigorously into the religious and philanthropic work of the city. He held services in Central Music Hall, which on Sunday evenings was densely crowded. Those services were discontinued after the Parliament of Religions, while he went to India and Japan. On his return, Oberlin offered him its President's chair. He went there in 1898, and began a vigorous work. It seemed as if he had found his right place and that a great career was beginning for him, when he was suddenly prostrated with illness, and after a week of suffering, on June 3 he was called away.

Christ's Prophecies

The Order of Events Deduced from our Lord's Eschatological Discourses

ONE of our Lord's most impressive eschatological utterances was the important parable spoken "because he was nigh to Jerusalem and because they (the disciples) opposed the Kingdom of God was immediately to appear." "A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return." The pounds entrusted to the servants during his absence, and with which they were to trade, could scarcely be expected, by any legitimate means, to increase so enormously in a few days or years. The evidence is overwhelming that our Lord expected, literally, a "long time" to lapse before he should return, that he so taught his disciples, and repeatedly warned them, by entreaty and parable, not to expect him too soon, nor to allow themselves to be deceived, giving assurance that when he did come, doubt concerning the fact would be impossible.

The parable of the Ten Virgins teaches the same transparent truth. The bridegroom tarries "till the watchers fall asleep from weariness. They start out at six o'clock in the morning. It is midnight when he comes and they all slumbered and slept.

The fourth item of importance to consider here, is also in the very face of prevailing opinions and notions amongst professing Christians. Whenever we have wars, famines, earthquakes, tidal waves, cyclones, volcanic eruptions, pestilences, and great persecutions, men talk wildly about the end of the "world" as at our doors. Be it ever borne in mind that our Lord never once intimated that the "world" would ever end—he only spoke of an "age," or period of time. What he did say of this present evil age, between his crucifixion and his coronation, was, that the phenomena he described would be current and common to the whole period. If they should cease, it might be inferred that a new age had already come. But national disturbances and international wars, the chastening hand of God in famines, the hatred of

HOT DAYS IN THE TENEMENTS

THEIR ONLY PLAY-GROUND

NEW YORK has been tried with some of the hottest spells ever recorded of the season. The dailies have reported a number of prostrations, and called attention to the fact that tenement dwellers already seek sidewalks, roofs and fire-escapes for a chance to lumber through nights unendurable in their stifling abodes. Children throng courts and alleys; and congregate in every bit of open space which the city provides. On roof gardens of charitable institutions there sometimes finds a small railed-off space covered with sand, where wee folks sport themselves. Only a few can be accommodated; thousands roam blissing pavements below. For such as these, green fields and flowery hillsides are waiting at our Children's Home. While hundreds of small voices pray "Can we go to Mont-Lawn?" Many friends answer: "Yes, little ones." Are not these beautiful birthday gifts? A. L. A., Duluth, $15. To send five children of true Christians, the rise of false prophets, worldliness, apostasies, and other features, were to characterize the whole period during the personal absence of Christ. In the distinctest manner our Lord tells his disciples what signs are not "the sign" of his coming, and specially what "the sign" of his coming for his elect is. Those current and common to all centuries are events that "must needs come first" before even the last "sign time" enters.

Let us now turn to the Olivet discourse in the gospel of Matthew. Just after the "end" of the Church's missionary age is spoken of in the fourteenth verse, something very different is introduced which cannot take place after the end is reached. According to the usual method of Scripture, and especially of the prophecies, after a sketch of the matter in hand has been given, there is a retrogression or recurrence, in order to retouch and complete the picture with increased particulars. It is like an artist drawing the outline of his picture and then completing the sketch. Accordingly, our Lord goes back to the time before the end, to speak of the outward condition of the disciples in Jerusalem and Palestine, when judgment should fall upon it.

It should be clearly seen that Jerusalem and the Jews are not the chief theme, but only the subordinate or secondary theme of this prophecy. They are only referred to here for the sake of the Christians, to whom one important event is the sign of the advent. Only so much of the history of Jerusalem is given as will be to the Church a sign of another and long-expected event. Therefore, the tribulation immediately preceding the advent is the great one, typified by the days of anguish that preceded Jerusalem's destruction, although from other scriptures we learn that the wrath which immediately follows the coming in glory will be infinitely more terrible. But because the Church will be taken up at that particular point, not one word is said either about the judgments or about the blessing that will come to Israel or to the world afterward. The only thing mentioned, as to be definitely accomplished by the Lord, is the "gathering of his saints" before the final stroke. The "same day" that Lot went out of Sodom, destructive judgment came down out of heaven. With emphasis, he says, "So shall it be at the (Parousia) coming of the Son of Man." The "same day" that the Church is taken to be with the Lord, the destructive judgments fall. Whether it be a day of twenty-four hours or longer, it certainly means a limited time of short duration. "To you who are troubled, rest with us when the Lord shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire taking vengeance upon them that know not God and obey not the Gospel."

Question of the Week

Does a parent do wisely to shield a son or daughter jealously from the ordinary stress and struggle of life?

Obstacles Develop Character

It is impossible for anyone to succeed unless thrown mostly or entirely on their own resources. Washington, Jackson, Lincoln, Garfield, Cleveland, Morse, Howe, Goodyear, Edison, and scores of others, became successful by encountering and conquering difficulties—not having them removed from their path. The sooner the child is taught that such must be met and must be vanquished, the sooner the child will become self-reliant and fitted for the great responsibilities of life. The pampered child is rarely heard from as a man.

WM. W. CASE.

The Duty of Parents

It is the parent's duty to prepare his children for the struggle of life, whether he be rich or poor. The poor are forced to meet the struggle. If the parent be rich, it will be hard and seem unnecessary for him to have his children see the troubles of life, but if rich today, to-morrow his riches may have flown; then his children, reared in the lap of luxury, almost ignorant of the real value of money and unused to any business ways, are left helpless and in a sad state. They then see the mistake their parent made in not insisting upon their being taught something to aid them in the battle with poverty. The parent should look forward in the future, and if riches have flown, it will be a great satisfaction to know his children can support themselves and parents also. ELIZABETH I. STEHMAN.

Shielded Children Become Weaklings

The parent, both loving and wise, will wish indeed to shield his child from stress and struggle, and yet will wish that child to have all the strength, physical and moral, that only stress and struggle can develop. How then shall he guide the child to the perfect result? Wishing to make life on the one hand not too easy, on the other hand not too hard, one seems to steer between Scylla and Charybdis. No positive rules can be laid down; but good common sense, supplemented by Divine guidance, can lift one over the impossibilities and give success. As trees grow strong wrestling with winds, so let the children wrestle more or less with hard lessons and work, and later on with varied duties and toils, that they may grow strong; for "to be weak is to be miserable." AMELIA HOYT.

A Prolific Cause of Failure

Most decidedly not. By so doing, false ideas of life are implanted in the child's mind and he is taught to shun every disagreeable duty. When a child so reared reaches maturity, he lacks those qualities of endurance and self-confidence so essential to his success, which are best developed by facing difficulties and mastering them. Thus we see so as by invisible hands. Small wonder if they develop selfish, thoughtless natures. After a while their peaceful surroundings fall away from them. Death strikes down the careful protector; financial loss, or some other of life's many ills, overtake the home, and these hot-house boys and girls must face new and hard situations, for which they are entirely unprepared. They are as helpless as tender hot-house plants are to withstand wind and sun. Many a young man so carefully reared finds himself unable to cope with the stern realities of business and mature life. Let the child grow "in wisdom and stature," by putting forth his own individual efforts, on tasks that correspond with his years. Small responsibilities will fix his thought and attention, and help him to develop self-reliance.

MRS. SARAH W. DOMES.

Developing by "Rough-and-Tumble"

The young people of to-day who would be of service to the world, who desire to live a full and complete life, to help shape their country's destiny and keep step with the march of progress, must actually become a part of the world. They must keep in touch with its great, throbbing pulse, must keep pace with the current of events, and feel the thrill of the life that now is. The pathway of life is not strewn with roses. We learn "to suffer and grow strong." The element of "rough-and-tumble" has developed the best qualities

In any event, the "stress and struggle of life" must be met with sooner or later. The young tree is made stronger by the storm, as well as by the nourishment received from the earth and air. So the young man or young woman becomes strong by meeting and overcoming life's difficulties; becomes useful by doing, by coming in contact with life. M. L. GOSS.

Prepare Them for All Emergencies

Parents cannot always shield their children from the "stress of life," and the wisest course is to prepare them for whatever may come. Some may admire the beauty of the protected life; but few do so in this practical age. The true character is the one that is strong as well as beautiful; and strength comes from battling with the storms of life. There is need for great wisdom to know just how to temper the bitterness of life for the youthful soul; but "if any lacketh wisdom, let him ask of God." It is a great comfort to parents when they have to leave their children, that they have some experience of life.

A. W. LEWIS.

Parents Often to Blame

Parents should prepare children, so far as possible, against probable crises and emergencies, as well as against the "ordinary stress and struggle of life." The parent who fails to do either is not only unwise, but is absolutely blameworthy. We must all take the world as we find it, and if we have found that it is not pure, unselfish, honest, in places, we should so fortify those who follow us that they will recognize the deficiencies, be able to meet them, and ready to help overcome the tendencies which are of themselves evil. Many a girl goes down into an evil life because she had not been trained to recognize its existence, and was, therefore, unaware of its approach toward her, when a little "schooling" by her parents would have made her able to "resist evil." And many a boy gets his first inkling of evil from someone against whose deficiencies he should have been trained, while his parents yet had it in their power to instruct him. The love which shields at the expense of protection and arming is weak and shortsighted! AUTHOR OF "PRESTON PAPERS."

Answers have also been received from Mrs. J. M. Vance, Ruth W. Pierson, Dennis Smith, Brigham, J. Flomerfelt, Mrs. Annie Kodd, Grace Watt, S. F. Elliott, E. J. Cusack, W. J. Mosier, E. E. J. W., Wheeling, W. Va.; A. W., Newark, N. J. and others. What constitutes the Lord's tenth in the case of a business man?

The Christian is not bound by law, his gifts are left at his own discretion, and any person prescribing a man's duty to him in this matter is assuming an office to which he has no valid claim. Do not let any one bring you under law. If, however, you wish to give a tenth of your income and you are a business man, we should say you ought to deduct from your gross receipts the cost of the goods sold, and all business expenses, a portion of the rent, salaries of help, etc., and give a tenth of the remainder, which is your personal income.

F. O. S., Prairie du Sac, Wis. Whenever a Christian finds his business conflicting with his conscience, if it be impossible to harmonize the two, he should take the first opportunity to change it.

Have You Set up a Beacon Light?

If you have not already done so, the opportunity is now afforded you. Send in your name and the names of your friends for enrollment as members of the Light-house League of the Bowery Mission. The League—already about one thousand strong—is organizing branches or Circles everywhere, modelled on the plan of the parent League, and ready to do Christian work in a simple, quiet, unostentatious way, wherever there is an opportunity. Full information, circulars and enrollment cards can be had on application to O. B. Booth, General Secretary, 92 Bible House, New York.

CORONATION OF EDWARD THE ELDER IN 902

English journals are calling attention to the historical coincidence of Edward VII's Coronation occurring just one thousand years after the crowning of Edward the Elder. The coincidence is really a double one. The first Edward's accession to the throne took place in 901, that of Edward VII in 1901; the coronation in each case coming a year afterward. Our illustration is from a historical group of the first Edward's coronation, in which the characters are represented by the people of Kingston, England, where the millenary celebration is being held this month.

many children, who have every advantage of wealth, whose lives are failures; while many, who from childhood have had to face the world, have risen to positions of influence and honor.

LYMAN J. WALKER.

Shielded Children Grow Up Helpless

No, it is not well to shield son or daughter from the hardships of life. In doing so, the child is often crippled for life. I know of a case of this kind. The daughter of the house had been always shielded from every hardship, imagined or real, and now, at middle age, is as practically helpless as a child. She was brought up perfectly independent, not being taught anything as a means of self-support in case she should not marry. That the daughter has been always delicate is the mother's only excuse—if she ever makes excuses—in thus bringing up what is now a grown-up child.

MARY DREW.

"Hot-house Children"

We frequently see parents who err in mistaken kindness of over-carefulness toward their children. The father and mother endure countless, unappreciated self-sacrifices, in order that their children may be care-free, and "have a chance to enjoy their youth." The future men and women who must shortly take their places in the active world, for failure or success, are reared in an atmosphere so cloudless and serene, that "the stress and struggle of life" seem to them vague as dreams. Their hard problems are all solved for them, and their difficulties smoothed out of our race. It indicates tastes and tendencies, and helps us to find a place in life. Through its influence our horizon broadens, our point of view changes, our ideals are made higher and nobler, and our whole outlook on life becomes more elevated. It is largely instrumental in creating and cultivating physical energy and muscular vigor, the true foundation of mental and moral development, and in exemplifying the recipe of ages, "A sound mind in a sound body."

JOSEPH C. HEIDMEYER.

We are Made Stronger by Trial

Childhood should be happy, free from care, full of sunshine; boyhood and girlhood full of wholesome pleasure and recreation. If children can be kept in this happy, evenly balanced frame of mind, without responsibility—that is the responsibility of men and women—and allowed to mingle socially with each other; being taught and being so reared and trained that their lives will teach them that the world is a good and pleasant place to live in; when they have reached young manhood and young womanhood, they are best equipped for life's battle. Work will then be a pleasure, and the memory of their childhood will ever be an inspiration and a help in the dark times which come to all of us. Putting the boy or girl at work too young, dwarfs mind and body, narrows the intellectual view and shortens life; but allowing them too much liberty without work, is still more dangerous. Many boys and girls are forced to work while young by stress of circumstances.

Among the Arabian Pearl Divers

A Gospel Field
very Little Known

A RABIA is a neglected country, and most of its vast area is practically unoccupied by any missionary society. It is a large blot of darkness on the world, even at the opening of the twentieth century of the Christian era. In a region of intellectual and moral night (larger than that portion of the United States that lies east of the Mississippi) there are only five points of light—five lonely mission stations on four thousand miles of coast. Only one of these now claims our attention. Perhaps there will be opportunity to hear of the other forts-of-light and their brave struggle against the kingdom of Moslem darkness in the future.

Bahrein is the name of a group of islands half-way down the Persian Gulf, on the Eastern coast of Arabia. They are mentioned in the Bible under the name of Dedan, and were, since the earliest times, the centre of the pearl fisheries of the Gulf. Once the old Phoenicians held them, and they were called Tylos. The Romans fought for their possession; the Persians conquered them, and left their record in a large mosque, with half-ruined minarets. The Portuguese traders came and built forts, but in 1622 were finally driven out by the Arabs. At present the group of islands is governed by an Arab chief called 'Isa bin Khalifa, who is under British protection.

The chief, indeed almost the only industry of the islanders, is pearl-diving. If Egypt is the gift of the Nile, Bahrein may well be called the gift of the pearl oyster. Nearly $2,000,000 worth of pearls are exported from the islands annually, although naturally the profit goes not into the purse of the poor diver, but into the coffer of the rich broker. Pearls cost toil and sacrifice, and the divers and fishermen do not have an easy time of it during the busy season from May to October. In one of the photographs on this page you see a pearl-diver's wife, with her babe in the cradle of date branches. Perhaps it was such a picture that was in the mind of the poet who wrote:

Dear as the wet diver to the eyes
Of his pale wife, who waits and weeps on shore,
By sands of Bahrein in the Persian Gulf.
Plunging all day in the blue waves—at night,
Having made up his tale of precious pearls,
Rejoins her in their hut upon the shore.

The islanders are nearly all Moslems, and had never heard of the Pearl of Great Price until the American missionaries came. In 1893, the first copies of the Word of God were sold, and step by step the fanatic opposition of the Moslem leaders was overcome. At first there was great objection to allowing any Christian to reside on the islands. Our colporteurs were stoned in the streets and their books often torn up or defiled. But love conquered, and the Holy Spirit has broken hard hearts up into soil fit for the seed of the Word. It was a long fight and sometimes very discouraging; but here, as in many other Moslem lands, the promises of Christ are being fulfilled and we see that God is able, even "out of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham," through faith in Jesus Christ.

Last year, from our little book and Bible depot, over fourteen hundred copies of Scripture went on their errand. Many other books are sold as well, and hundreds of tracts put into Moslem hands every year. We medical missions. In Bahrein, too, this is the fact. From the first day of our arrival, there has been the ministry of healing as well as of preaching. Only recently, however, has the Abraham Mission had a qualified physician stationed here. When Dr. and Mrs. Thoms, both graduates from Michigan University, came, medical work was opened on a larger scale and God has rewarded their faith. Last year over ten thousand cases were treated, many of them most pitiful. These dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. Sometimes it is from the heart, but generally only through ignorance. Actual cautery with a hot iron is a favorite Arab remedy for all diseases, even in the case of infants. Arab doctors are arrant quacks, and their remedies often worse than the disease. In all Eastern Arabia, gun-shot wounds are treated with a poultice of dates, onions and tamarind, and the accident is guarded against in the future by wearing a lead amulet.

It is very discouraging to treat the people in their mat-huts, because of their filthy habits and primitive ways. We prayed earnestly for a hospital, and God answered. Where the little mud-hut, with its mat roof, did service to hold a few patients, the walls of the Mason Memorial Hospital, the first hospital in all Eastern Arabia, are now rising. Pray that it may prove a Bethel, as well as a Bethesda.

Among the most pitiful cases that come for treatment are the pearl-divers who are bitten by sharks or run through by a sword-fish. The doctor has just gone out to see such a patient; last year he had several amputations for shark-bite. The poor diver not only loses his limbs, but often his livelihood; yet without surgical skill few would recover at all. It is a rich experience to tell such a group of patients how Christ sacrificed himself to win for us the Pearl of Great Price.

One branch of work we must not forget to mention. It is our itinerating by land and water, on donkeys, or on the ship of the desert, to the distant villages, and among the nomad tents. The Arabian Mission is the only American mission that works among the descendants of Ishmael. If you would learn more of the crying needs of this dark land and the showers of blessing that are falling even now on the desert sands, write to the Secretary of the Mission, Rev. H. N. Cobb, D.D., 25 East Twenty-second street, New York City. May we not ask for the prayers of everyone who reads this paper, in behalf of neglected Arabia? There is no Christian Herald for seven hundred miles west of us; none until you reach Muscat, six hundred miles southeast of us; and our fellow-missionaries at Busrah on the north, are three hundred and sixty-five miles away.

CONGRATULATIONS FOR GRADUATION DAY

TEXT—Numbers 6: 24: "The Lord bless thee"

IAST week I received an invitation. It came from one of the large colleges of the East, and it read thus: "The President, Trustees and Faculty of Princeton University request the pleasure of your company at the exercises to be held during Commencement week." That was all the wording the square card had on it; yet those twenty-three words had for me an absorbing interest.

That invitation attracted me because it was sent by one of my old Sunday School scholars. As I held the square card in my hand, I seemed to be standing again in the sacred room of the dear old Second Presbyterian Church in Pittsburg. I could see this young man, then a little boy in short trousers, sitting at the feet of his teacher. I could hear the sweet young voices singing the old songs we always loved to sing. As I read between the lines of that invitation, I soliloquized: "How time does slip away! My Sunday School scholar is now a grown man. Willie's name has been changed to William. He is no longer a child. Graduating from one of the greatest universities of the world, he is about to step forth to the battle of life, a fully equipped recruit. He is about to take his position by my side in the ranks. We must hereafter look upon each other as brothers."

Graduation Reminiscences

Then, as I still read that invitation, my study room changed again. I seemed to be a thousand miles away. I was walking through the long corridors of memory. It seemed to me as though I had gone back to the time when I myself, gowned and capped, was marching with the senior class to participate in the scenes attending my own graduation. The classmates who were then seated by my side, have all scattered. Some are ministers, some lawyers, some doctors, some electricians, some merchants, and some soldiers. They are living in the North and the South, the East and the West. Some are dead. That graduation scene was a sad time for many of us. College affections are very strong. We young men knew that we should never be to each other the same again.

Then, as I sat in the quietude of my study, with the hopes and anxieties of my own graduation day passing in review before me, I said to myself: "I wonder if some of the young people whom I know and love, who are graduating from school or college this June month, would not like me to come and sit by their side and tell them what the Commencement exercises truly mean in their lives." I wondered, as I sat there, holding that invitation in my hand, if I could not at this critical time of their lives, say something to inspire them, to nerve them, and to encourage them not only with faith in themselves but also with faith in God. And I bowed my head over that white invitation, and made this simple, earnest prayer: "Oh, God, help me to say something that may be helpful to the young people who are graduating this spring and about to buckle on the armor of life. Oh, Christ, may I be able to bring my young friends nearer to thee, so thou shalt bless them. May this plea be answered in the noble lives of these young men and women, which shall be consecrated to thee and thy service. For Jesus' sake I ask it. Amen."

A Critical Epoch

I congratulate the young men and women who are graduating from the different higher institutions this June, because now the financial struggle which many have undergone for the sake of an education, is practically over. Here and there, a young man who receives a college diploma may be the son of a rich father. He may have had, during his scholastic career, no ambition. He may have gone through school and college merely because his rich parents compelled him to go. He may have spent most of his time in idleness, and only worked enough to just slip through the different examinations by what is known in college as "cramming," with the aid of a tutor. But such a young man does not represent the great mass of college graduates. For most young men and women, the acquiring of a higher education has been a struggle,—an awful financial struggle. Most of the college graduates come from humble homes, and the education of these young men and women represents intense sacrifice lasting through many years, not only on their own part, but also on the part of their loved ones.

Let us study, as an illustration, the past life of that young man who this year is graduating at the head of his class at Yale or Harvard, or the University of Michigan, or the University of Nebraska. In all probability, he was born in a farmhouse. The family was comparatively poor. In raising enough money to send him to college, his mother broke down her health. The sisters for years have taught school, or worked in the factory to put him there. The father, to put him there, dismissed the hired man who once helped upon the farm. The boy himself has had to ring the chapel bell; to work during the hot months of summer; to wait upon the college dining-room table; to tutor backward students; to work night and day in order to stay there. Few people realize what the struggle of getting a college education means for the average young man, except those who have themselves participated in that struggle. One day, a classmate was looking very blue and depressed. I said to him: "What is the matter? Has anything gone wrong?" "Yes," he answered, "something has gone wrong, and awfully wrong. You know father and mother do not dress very well. As I went around in the homes of the different boys, and saw how well their parents dressed, I began to be ashamed of my parents' wardrobe. Lately I have been upbraiding father for wearing such shabby clothes. Last night, I again asked him to get a new suit. 'Why, father,' I said, 'You have not bought a new suit for three years, and mother's dress is so old, and has been made over so many times, that the needle marks make the cloth look like a wire netting, all full of holes.' With that my father turned and looked at me. Tears came into his eyes as he said: 'Harry, I am sorry you are ashamed of the way your mother and I dress; but, my boy, I have not very much money, and it is hard to get along. We do not dress as well as we might, because we want you and your younger brother to be able to get an education at college. Harry, we do not dress poorly from choice. We are doing it for you and Charles.' Why, Talmage," added my classmate, "I felt so badly when I realized all that my father and mother were doing for me, that I wept and sobbed like a little child."

A Mother's Devotion

To show what a struggle a higher education might mean, the President of Hampton and Sydney college once told this incident: Many years ago, a wife and mother was left a widow with four or five fatherless little children to support. The dead father's wish was to have his eldest son follow his footsteps into the pulpit, and be a Gospel minister. The mother was left penniless, with a large family upon her hands. The wish of the dead father seemed hopeless; but the mother went to work. She scrubbed, she sewed, she struggled. She made her boy study night and day. She pushed him through the preparatory school. She fitted him for college. After a while, this boy was able to help himself a little, but the mother still had to bear the brunt of the battle. The young man entered college. He passed through his four years of study and came to graduation. He went to the president of the institution and asked if his mother could sit by his side when he graduated. The president, who knew of her noble life, gladly consented. When the day of graduation came, the wealth and fame of some of the noblest families about the region of the college town, were gathered within the college walls. The exercises went on until they reached the climax. The valedictorian was about to make his address. This young man, the son of the poor widow, stepped forward. He was not only a brilliant scholar, who had captured every first prize in his class, but he was a natural born orator. With his first word, a hush fell upon the assembled audience. At times his voice was as low and sweet as the singing birds making love to each other in the harvest fields. Again that voice rolled and swelled as though the storm clouds were crashing together, after the forked lightning had hurled its bolt and ripped open the heart of a mighty tree. At times the stiletto of the tongue of denunciation cut and slashed; then the message of love would sob and plead. When the peroration was finished, the bouquets of flowers began to fall as the apple blossoms tumble at the shaking of the winds. The young man gathered up the bouquets and piled them into the lap of the little old woman, prematurely aged by overwork, who sat there in her faded gown. As he threw those flowers into her lap, he said, "Mother, they are yours. I have done but little; you have done everything." Then when the president of the college came forward and presented the valedictorian with a gold medal, which had been voted to him by the faculty because he had graduated with the highest average ever held by a Hampton and Sydney student, the young man turned and pinned this medal upon the bosom of the faded dress of the little old woman, as he said, "Mother, that medal is yours; it is all yours. You won it, not I."

So, as I see you young men and women coming up to graduation day, I see other faces behind yours. I see those whose sacrifices have made this scene possible. I congratulate you that for you the hard financial struggle of getting an education is over. I congratulate you that the long and arduous struggle of your loved ones in your behalf is also over. I congratulate you, because now you can go forth, in the strength of God, to accomplish something in this world by the power of education. You can pay back, in a good, pure, true, successful life some of the rewards which the old folks, your brothers, and sisters, and friends have a right to expect an account of what they have done for you; and I congratulate you further because you can not only repay them by the results in your own life, but because you can now help your younger brothers and sisters to be educated as you yourself were helped.

Value of College Training

Again, I congratulate you, young June graduates, because while your intellect has been trained and moulded by the expert minds of a college faculty, your hearts have been spiritually influenced and helped, during all these years, by the prayers and the encouragement of godly parents. In this age, for the specialization of talent, it is absolutely necessary for a young man to have a higher education. The land is so filled with colleges and high schools and institutes of technology and schools of all sorts, that the young man who has no education or a sadly-defective one, is mightily handicapped in the race of life. All the different positions of influence will be naturally filled by those who have the best training, just as those who graduated from West Point naturally rose to be the great military leaders of the Civil War. Here and there we might find a great volunteer general, like John A. Logan, or Alfred Howe Terry, or Nelson A. Miles, but after all, such men were the exceptions. Grant and Lee, Sherman and Longstreet, Jackson and Sheridan, Beauregard and Meade, Polk and Thomas, Johnson and Hooker, were all graduates of West Point. In this age of many schools and colleges, I would no more think of sending my boys forth into life's battle without a higher education than I would expect one of them to become a physician without entering a medical school, or a lawyer without studying law.

But, my young friend, a man who is limited merely to a mental education is only half educated. The man whose intellectually developed brain is not ballasted by a morally-developed heart is heading towards certain shipwreck. The sharper the knife that is placed in the hand of a little child the easier it is for that child to do itself an injury. Aaron Burr was an intellectual giant; but Aaron Burr's wasted life was caused by a heart that was morally bedwarfed by sin. Thomas Paine had one of the greatest brains ever placed within the skull of a man; but Thomas Paine's heart was so diseased by sin that he was a drunkard, a reprobate, and a practical outcast. Lord Byron "drank every cup of fame, drank early—deeply drank—drank draughts which might have quenched the throats of millions, and then died of wretchedness," because his heart was morally diseased. It is absolutely necessary for every young man and woman, in order to a happy and successful life, to have a truly-developed Christian heart, yoked to a truly-developed intellectual brain.

Parental Dedication

Now, young people, while the University teachers have been developing your brain, in all probability the moral teachers, like your Christian father and mother, and sisters and loved ones, have been developing your heart. By your training and your past religious life, you know what is right and what is wrong. On the day when, as a young man, James Harper left the home of his birth, in Newtown, Long Island, his mother placed her hand upon his head, and said: "Jimmy, you are now about to go into the great, wide world to make a success or a failure. Remember, my boy, you go from a Christian home, and do not disgrace it. If you disgrace this home, remember, that on the great Day of Judgment before God I shall witness against you, and tell God that you were brought up right, and dedicated by our prayers to his service, and that you went to destruction of your own accord." You know just as much what you morally ought to do as James Harper knew what he morally ought to do.

So, on this Graduation Day of June, I congratulate you young people because you have had such competent teachers to develop your intellect, and I also congratulate you because you have had such efficient moral teachers to develop your heart. You were rocked in a Christian cradle. You were started forth with Christian prayers. There has never been a day, in all the time you have been away to college, that your father at the family altar did not make a morning prayer something like this: "God bless and protect and guard our boy and girl at college. God make John a good man. God make Sarah a good woman." Your mother, kneeling by his side, would say, "Amen, amen! God bless my absent son and my absent daughter." There was not a week in all your college life when you did not receive a letter from home. Perhaps your Professor of Belles-Lettres might say they were poorly written, but Christ would say they were beautifully written letters. In those letters, your mother always wrote about her Saviour, and she always penned a sentence something like this: "My dear boy, remember that when you are studying about the ancient Greeks and Romans, you must not forget to read your Bible and study about Christ. I would have you know nothing but Jesus only, rather than have you know everything that worldly scholars might want you to learn, if thereby you would neglect to know about my Christ."

A Mother's Tombstone

To show how much a young man ought to appreciate the moral training of his old home, as well as the intellectual training which he receives at college, the late J. Sterling Morton, who was once a member of Mr. Cleveland's cabinet, placed this epitaph upon the tombstone of his dead wife: "Here lies Caroline French, wife of J. Sterling Morton and mother of Joy, Paul, Clark and Mark Morton." Then the father took his four sons to the grave of his dead wife, and said: "Boys, your mother is buried here. If any one of you does anything dishonorable, or anything of which she would be ashamed if she were alive, I will chisel your name from her tombstone." And so, addressing you in the same spirit in which Secretary Morton spoke to his four sons, I now say to you, "Young men and young women, remember the teaching of your parents, who first gave the right direction to your heart and nature, and as you would not dishonor them by ignoring their moral teaching, so I beg of you, do not intellectually dishonor or disgrace your Alma Mater, from whose walls you are being graduated to-day."

Again I congratulate you, young people, because hereafter you are about to have the inspiration of daily rewards. It is a hard task for a young man to work for something that is to happen ten, twenty, thirty years hence; to work for something that is to take place so far away, that it seems as though the fact will never happen; to work for something in the way that a young man pays his first life insurance premium. I suppose my personal experience in getting insured is that of almost every other young man. When I took out a twenty-year tontine life insurance policy, I felt as though I was paying for something which would happen at the end of eternity. I paid my first premium very grudgingly. I paid the second in the same way. At the third year, I was almost ready to surrender the whole policy. But as the flying years began to go over my head as a flock of migrating birds, I began to see that the twentieth year was not so far away. Now, the last investment I would be willing to sacrifice is that twenty-year life insurance policy.

So the young student, who works at his studies, is sometimes willing to slight them because graduation day, like death, seems to be far away at the edge of the horizon. The more the student works, the further graduation day seems to recede. But, my young friends, from now on you shall see the direct returns from your daily labors. You shall be able to get your payments for work day by day and week by week. You shall have daily rewards, and your successes will give you daily inspirations.

But there is another side to this thought. As you are hereafter to get your rewards if you do right, so, if you neglect to do your duty, you shall also receive swift punishment. Heretofore you were only looked upon as a minor, a child. If you did anything wrong in the past, the world was very apt to pardon you, saying: "Well, it was the action of a silly boy or girl. The wrong was merely the result of a college prank." But from now on, young graduates, remember, the world does not look upon you as boys or girls. You are full-fledged men and women. As full-grown men and women, you must take your positions in life, and do a full man's and a full woman's part. And if you do wrong from now on, the world will neither forgive nor forget your errors. Oh, to-day, as you must now begin to do a full man's or woman's work, I pray you, seek the help of that God in whom your father and mother trusted, and who is able and ready to help you also to perform well your part in the battle of life.

The Flying Years

An aged writer once figuratively declared: "The longest half of a man's earthly life is that in which he lives before twenty years of age is reached." I think that statement is true. No matter whether a man lives to be seventy, eighty, ninety, or even a hundred years old, the longest half of life is that which he passes during the first twenty years. When we were young, time seemed to have leaden feet. Time, like a snail, would crawl. It never walked, or ran, or flew. To a little boy, the last week before Christmas is almost endless. Every second has the longevity of an adult's hour. The week seems as long as the average adult's year.

But as we grow older, the years seem to have seven-leaved boots. They grow so fast that they almost seem to be born with gray hairs. To the man in active life, January seems almost to tread upon the heels of December, and spring and autumn seem to be twin sisters. My young friends, though you may hardly be out of your teens, yet in the sense in which I speak, you have already lived half of your life. During that first half, you have had a hard struggle to get an education. At times you were almost in despair. But in answer to your mother's and father's prayers, and also to your own, God always came to your rescue. You were able to get through somehow. Here you are at Graduation Day. So, in the latter part of your life, if you trust God and do your best, he will surely see you safely through. You are going to have troubles, and hard troubles. You are going to stumble over the hillocks of new-made graves. You are going to have injustices practiced upon you. But if you will place your hand in the Divine Father's hand, he will never let you go.

He is able to deliver, as well as to guide. To illustrate this truth, Dr. Newton, the noted English divine, used to tell a wonderful story of

Vicarious Suffering

The scene was laid in the pretty little German village of Ragenbach. One day, a number of people were gathered in the large room of the village inn. As the party was merry-making, suddenly a huge dog appeared at the open door—the only door which afforded egress from the room. The monster's eyes were bloodshot; his long red tongue was protruding from the mouth; his lips were covered with a mass of white foam. At a glance, every one saw that the dog was mad. Some of the guests were too frightened to even pray. From every lip went the cry, "Mad dog! Mad dog! My God, what shall we do?" With that, the swarthy blacksmith arose; his arms were a mass of knotted muscles. "Stand back, men," he cried, "there is need of only one man dying here. If necessary, I will be that man." So, while the village blacksmith leaped forward and clutched the mad dog by the throat and bore the struggling beast to the floor, the assembled people made their escape. The mad dog buried his teeth in the arms of the blacksmith, but he would not let go until all his friends were saved. Then he flung the mad dog into the room, where the brute was afterward shot. The brave blacksmith then went to his shop and took a long, strong chain. He riveted one end of that chain about his body, and the other end about the anvil. Then he turned to his friends and said: "Now, I am safe and can do no harm. Bring me food and water while I live. Keep out of my reach when I am mad. The rest I leave with God." Soon the awful paroxysm of hydrophobia was clutching at his throat. In nine days, the brave blacksmith's agony was ended. God has made it possible for us all to live right for time and for eternity, by sacrificing his only begotten Son for us. As the village blacksmith died in the chain which he had riveted to his own body, so Christ died for us upon the Cross which he himself carried to Calvary.

Now, my young friends, who are about to graduate this June day, I commit your earthly and heavenly life into the protecting care of your Divine Father. And as your days of learning are not closed, but have just commenced, as you go from college into the great School of Life, I bid you perform your tasks well. If you will do this by the power of the Holy Spirit there shall come a day when you shall be participants in another graduation scene. Then you shall have a diploma taken from the Lamb's Book of Life. That diploma shall be written in the blood of Jesus Christ. That diploma shall allow you to graduate from an earthly preparatory school into the great University of Heaven, where higher lessons and nobler service await you, and where you shall never cease to learn about the goodness of God and to sing the praises of Christ and his redeeming love.

A GREAT SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION

TO-MORROW, the Tenth International Sunday School Convention will assemble at Denver, Colo. It is expected that fully one thousand prominent workers and Sunday School specialists will be in attendance as delegates. As the entire subject of Bible instruction will be thoroughly discussed, more than usual interest will attach to the proceedings of the Convention, and its action will be keenly watched by religious teachers everywhere. One of the officers of the Convention has furnished the following outline of the programme to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

The International Convention is a delegated body, representing auxiliary associations, and standing for the organized co-operation of Sunday School interests. The International Lesson System is its chief badge. Under its auspices, ten thousand local conventions are held annually, by which it promotes the best and most practical methods, raises the standard of teaching, and furthers Sunday School extension.

All the values of a great convention will obtain in the present gathering. The spiritual purpose will be well to the front. Methods that work are to be discussed, and only topics of supreme importance will be introduced. Among the speakers announced are men and women of national reputation. Dr. A. F. Schaffler, of New York, will make an address upon "Teaching the Bible as Literature—Plus What?" Dr. C. H. Daniels, of the American Board, speaks of Sunday Schools and Missions, and Dr. A. E. Dunning, of "The Master and His Disciples." Dr. G. C. Lorimer will give two addresses, "The Message from the Cross" and "Christ, the World's Greatest Teacher." Among the other speakers announced are Dr. J. A. Worden, Pres. E. Y. Mullins, Hon. M. G. Brumbaugh, Hon. Hoke Smith, of Atlanta; Dr. John Potts, of Canada; Rev. A. C. Dixon, of Boston; Marion Lawrence, General Secretary; Dr. H. M. Hamill, Hugh Cork, E. M. Ferguson and others.

Most prominent of all subjects that will be discussed by the Convention will be the Sunday School Lesson itself. The Lesson Committee is only a committee for selection. It does not provide expositions of the lesson. The Committee has always regarded opinion and advice from outside, and counsel and suggestion have been invited; Biblical experts and Sunday School teachers have been asked to co-operate in producing what will best meet the need of the entire constituency. At the last International Convention, held in Atlanta, it was reported that 13,034,728 pupils in North America were studying these selections from Sunday to Sunday. The Committee meets frequently for consultation and conference. Its work is then forwarded to members of the British section, with a request for judgment and advice. None of the Committee has ever received a salary, nor has any member a pecuniary interest in the work of the Committee, as a whole. The traveling expenses of the Committee are met through an assessment levied by the treasurer of the International Convention upon the publishers of the Lesson Helps. The personnel of the Committee has been significant from the beginning. The names of such past members as Bishop J. H. Vincent, Dr. John Hall, Prof. Alfred Cave, of England, give an idea of the character and intellectual quality of the men who have so generously served the interests of world wide Bible study. During thirty years, thirty-nine persons have served upon the Committee. Rev. John Potts, D.D., Ontario, Methodist, is the Chairman. Of the present members, Mr. B. F. Jacobs is senior in service, having been a member of each Committee. In the British section, Rev. J. Munroe Gibson has also been successively reappointed since 1872.

The report of the Committee will be read by the Secretary, Dr. A. E. Dunning, and considerable time will be given to its discussion. Hon. Hoke Smith will preside at to-morrow's opening session. The first day will be largely devoted to greetings, addresses, and the appointment of committees for organization. On June 27 the chief business in the forenoon will be the Executive Committee's report and review of the year's work, the report of General Secretary Lawrence, and the election of Convention officers. The afternoon will be given up to short addresses by representatives from different States, and a message from the Finance Committee. On June 28, the Lesson Committee will present its report, and the question, "How can the lesson system be improved?" will be discussed in fifteen-minute addresses. Afternoon session will be largely devoted to the discussion of primary and junior work. Monday will be devoted to Missions, to the discussion of various practical questions affecting the work, and to the selection of a place for holding the next Convention. A variety of interesting addresses will take up the afternoon. The Convention will close on June 30.

Great care has been exercised in arranging the programme. Conferences were held in Boston, New York, Toledo, Chicago and Denver, and no effort was spared to make it the most fruitful Convention ever held in the interest of Sunday School work. Undoubtedly it is to be one of the leading religious events of 1902. The interests involved, and the bearing of the Convention discussions upon the entire question of Biblical instruction, indicate the full importance of the gathering. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be represented, and will publish an account of the proceedings.

THE JUBILEE ANNIVERSARY OF THE FAMOUS BIBLE HOUSE, IN NEW YORK CITY

SUNDAY next, June 29, will be a Jubilee date in the history of the American Bible Society. The Bible House in New York, now the centre and focus of radii of blessing reaching out to the ends of the earth, dates the beginning of its existence to a ceremony performed just fifty years ago—Tuesday, June 29, 1852. On that day, as the minutes of the managers record, "In the presence of a large assembly," the Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen, President of the Society, laid the corner-stone of the building with impressive ceremonies.

The building with its site, then virgin land, was to cost $303,000, and the managers had pledged themselves not to use in its construction a single cent that had been contributed for the propagation of the Bible. They had in hand, however, $105,000, for which sum they had sold their old building in Nassau street, which, erected in 1823, had become too small for the work of the Society. Friends interested in the enterprise had contributed $59,000 more toward the cost of erection, leaving $139,000 still to be provided. It speaks volumes for the energy of the management, as well as for the liberality of the Christian public, that within ten years of the completion of the building, the whole amount had been paid. The building was free and clear of mortgage, and so remains.

The building was finished in time for the annual meeting of May 12, 1853, and the managers, with justifiable pride, called attention in their report to the commodious and substantial structure which had become the headquarters of the Society. It covers, they said, nearly three-quarters of an acre, and is six stories high, with cellars and vaults. The front, on Fourth avenue, 198 feet long; on Astor Place, 202 feet; on Third avenue, 77 feet, and on Ninth street, 232 feet. Accommodation was provided not only for the presses and bindery, and suitable rooms for the use of the managers, but for offices, which, being rented to reputable societies, would provide a source of income.

The erection of the Bible House, as we have already hinted, was not the beginning of the work of the American Bible Society. That beginning dates back to the year 1816, and even then it was a combination or concentration of other societies, the oldest of which, the Philadelphia Bible Society, was organized in 1808.

Although the work contemplated by the Society was so extensive and important, it began its operations on an exceedingly modest scale. At first, the entire stock was accommodated by its agent in his office, in an upper room of a building at Nassau and Cedar streets. These quarters soon proved too small, and Mr. Fanshaw, who was the Society's printer, provided a room in his establishment for the use of the Society. It was nine feet by twelve, and was considered ample for the purpose. The business outgrowing these quarters, a four-story building was rented in Sloat Lane (now Hanover street). The third and fourth floors were occupied by the printer; the second floor was a bindery; and the front room of the first floor was used as the agent's office. The rear room, twenty feet square, was the Society's store-room, and it is remembered that the agent expressed the daring prediction that he should yet see that room filled with Bibles. So abundantly was it fulfilled, that in 1823 the issue of Bibles for that one year reached a total of 54,805, and it had become necessary to have still more commodious quarters. A new building was erected in Nassau street at a cost of $22,500.

In 1828, the issues of the Society reached an aggregate of 200,000 copies, and again the quarters had become too small. Besides, the managers contemplated the daring innovation of printing by steam power, and an additional building had to be provided for the purpose. By the end of the year 1831 all the additions had been completed, at a cost of $18,050. In this building, costing with the original edifice $40,550, extensive and imposing as it then appeared, the work of the Society was done until 1853, when the edifice it now occupies was erected.

During the fifty years which have elapsed since the corner-stone of the Bible House was laid, the American Bible Society has done a most beneficent work. With its extended accommodations, it vastly increased its operations, issuing not only the English edition of the sacred book in various styles of type and binding, and producing editions which it sold below cost in order to make the book accessible to the very poorest people; but translating and printing it in foreign tongues for the use of missionaries. In the year 1800 the Bible was printed in about thirty different languages and dialects. It is now published in over four hundred, and of these over one hundred have been the work of the American Bible Society. Bibles, Testaments and portions have come continually from its busy presses, until now the aggregate number of these volumes amounts to over seventy millions. Co-operating with the missionary societies, it has provided them with the best of all resources for their work, and it has happened more than once that when the missionaries have been excluded from a land, the circulation of the Bible through the Society's agents has prepared the way for their return. Being inter-denominational, the Society has been a willing helper to all denominations, and has, therefore, a claim on the support of all. With a larger income, it could do a still more extensive work, and could send the Word of life to still other peoples who have as yet no Bible, or only a portion of it, in their own tongue.

Our readers will be glad to see on this page a picture of the building, the jubilee of which is now celebrated, and with it a portrait of Vice-President Brouwer, by whom, since the death of President Fancher, much of the President's duty has been performed. With these, we publish the portraits of Secretaries Rev. John Fox, D.D., Rev. William I. Haven, D.D., and Rev. Edward P. Ingersoll, D.D., on whose shoulders the heavy responsibility of carrying on and still further extending the work of this excellent Society now rests.

PREACHING IN A BASEBALL FIELD

FOR some years past, there has been outdoor preaching in Boston on the famous old Common, on Sunday afternoons. A new method of reaching many of the non-churchgoers has lately been inaugurated under the direction of the Boston Evangelical Alliance, which is composed of a number of Protestant churches of various denominations, working together for the common good. This organization has begun a series of Sunday afternoon meetings on the National League Baseball Grounds, on Columbus Avenue. The plan of securing these spacious grounds for Sunday afternoon meetings originated with the Rev. A. C. Dixon, of the Ruggles Street Church. That Church is within a short distance of the ball grounds. To the surprise of everyone concerned, the National League readily agreed to open the grounds for the religious meetings absolutely free of charge.

Some of the most interesting outdoor meetings ever held in Boston are now promised. Such notable Christian workers as John Willis Baer, of the Christian Endeavor Society; Dr. A. C. Dixon, Baptist; Rev. A. H. Plumb, Congregational; Rev. J. J. Dunlop, Presbyterian; Rev. C. E. Davis, Methodist, and such well-known Boston pastors as Revs. W. T. McElveen, W. W. Bustard, H. S. Johnson, and also the veteran Dr. J. L. Withrow, of the Park Street Church, will speak at the meetings. A great choir of five hundred voices, un-all summer, holding meetings in the tenement districts and on the street corners.

The tenement-house dwellers will turn out almost en masse to listen to the Word of God in the great Boston ball grounds this summer.

der the leadership of Prof. C. C. Case, of Ohio, who was with Mr. Moody for twelve years, will lead the singing.

The first meeting was held on Sunday, June 8, and fully two thousand persons assembled in the great amphitheatre to listen to stirring addresses by Mr. Baer and Dr. Dixon. The ball grounds are in the tenement house district of the Roxbury section of Boston, and it is probable that many of the dwellers in the tenements heard the Gospel that day for the first time in years.

At the close of the preaching services, after-meetings will be conducted by the Workingmen's Bible Class of the Ruggles Street Church. This great class is composed of over 400 real workingmen, under the leadership of an earnest Christian worker, Mr. Horace G. Wellington. In addition to the after-meetings, the class will also conduct meetings with a "Gospel Wagon"

A SERMON THAT COST $14,750

By...
REV. C. H. YATMAN

PREACHING is oftentimes very expensive for the listeners! Very! But likewise very profitable. It cost one man who heard me $14,750 for a single discourse; and yet I was none the richer, save in gladness of heart and joy of mind.

Those who think the Gospel of our risen Lord has lost its power to produce great upheavals in human life, should read the unwritten records of missionaries, whose truth must of necessity be like fire against the secret iniquity of those before him, if any change come to their character by Christ. It is truth that makes men free. What prison is worse or what slavery more galling than that of a man locked in the cell of knowledge of his own foul deed, or chained to habit of wrong, the thought of which, day and night, is like unto the flesh-tearing lash of the Arab slave-trader.

The unheard groans and unmeasured pains of men in secret sin, if put in form of weight, would sink a world.

The preacher knows this only too well, if he be a true preacher, and has knowledge of God, and of the Bible and of men. Furthermore, he knows that here or hereafter, there can be no peace apart from repentance; that there is no use in trying to heal the wound until the splinter is pulled out—and genuine repentance includes restitution, where it can be made.

Full two thousand miles from where I am writing this, amidst the scenes of men making money—making it by means fair or foul—I stood in a crowded hall facing an immense throng. Two out of every three were men. By some good power of God, Jew and Gentile, rich and poor, good and bad, were there alike. I remember it all so well now. The hymns were poorly sung; they were in no humor to praise and scarcely in any mood for prayer. Few bowed their heads when devotions came. The moment for my message arrived. Fearless and bold, I arose and said:

"He that covereth his sins shall not prosper."

A truth which God Almighty has written by history so plainly, that no one but a fool would pass it by unread.

For full forty minutes I affirmed the truth of the old Bible; history, experience and conscience alike were with me in proof. "They knew it was wicked to do wrong, that it was sinful to do evil, that it was criminal to break the laws of God."

But little remains in memory of the immediate after results in the hall, save that scores asked for prayer, and many bowed and wept when I gave the other truth that "whoso confesseth and forsaketh his sins shall obtain mercy."

The startling thing happened when I got back to my hotel. I was tired. It had taken life, real life out of me to preach that sermon. I just laid my hat on a chair and flung myself on the bed, overcoat and all, completely exhausted. There was a knock at the door, but I was too much worn out to even answer. It opened, and in walked a great, tall, fine-looking fellow, fully six feet, dressed as a cowboy, but good stuff; a large sombrero hat, which he kept on, and big six-shooter stuck in his belt. For a moment he looked at me, and never said a word; then he turned and locked the door and threw the key over on the floor.

What it all meant I did not know. The fact was, I did not care. I had done my duty. I had "warned the wicked" in a faithful way; and if I was to die now "with my boots on," as they very frequently do in that part of the world, why, I was ready.

He pulled a chair up near the bed, sat down, elbows on his knees, hands to his cheeks, his great big brown eyes burning with fire, and looked straight through to my soul. That look lasted fully five minutes. He never spoke a word. I was too tired to utter a syllable. Suddenly he broke out:

"My God!!! You hit me hard to-night." I made no answer.

"Say! can you help a man that lives in hell and wants to get out?"

I leaned up a little, propped my head with my hand, and asked: "Who is the man?"

"I, great heavens! I am the one."

"Tell me about it: let all out, and if I can help you, I will. If I cannot, I know One who can."

"Who is that?"

"God."

I sat up on the edge of the bed, and out of his broken heart came a sad tale of sin. He was at the head of a great ranch, whose cattle and cotton and wool made its English owner rich. As trusted agent and manager, he had stolen over thirteen thousand dollars. Stealing makes a man a thief, and the truth of the sermon in the hall had shown him his real self. It was not so much the money that he had stolen, as the thought of what the stealing had made him—a thief! I can hear him repeating it now.

"I'm a thief! I'm a thief! Oh, my God! what shall I do?"

I told him. It needs no lawyer to give advice in such a case.

"Repent; restore the money; ask God for mercy. Let him give you a new heart and a good life. Let him make you good and keep you so."

He was well able to pay back all he had taken. It was his own proposition to add the interest. We figured it all out at six per cent.—fourteen thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars in round figures.

There is one Englishman who should love America to that amount; at least he is three thousand pounds sterling in pocket. Preaching did it.

My tiredness somehow had left me. When we arose from our knees, where both had prayed, I said:

"Isn't it good to be made good?"

"Yes, better than gold," said he. And if any would like to know why one branch of the Christian Church is making such headway in the Southwest, I can tell by pointing out a great-hearted, brown-eyed, six-foot Christian gentleman, whose tireless energy is given to the extension of a Gospel that has real power. This he knows full well.

THE ANCESTRAL HOME OF THE WASHINGTONS IN SULGRAVE, ENGLAND

This picture of a substantial, old-fashioned English country-seat, possesses a special interest for American readers. In a very quaint neighborhood, not far from London, by rail, this house—the ancestral home of the Washington family—is still to be seen, nestled midst rural surroundings. The Washington family for generations owned the manor of Sulgrave. It is stated that Queen Elizabeth stayed one night in this sequestered spot, and the house has still the cupboard where her august Majesty, in her happy mood, hid herself, when playing hide-and-seek on that occasion. John Washington, of Warton, Lancashire, married the daughter of Robert Kitson, and became the parent of Laurance Washington, who was twice Mayor of Northampton. It was he who secured in 1539 the manor of Sulgrave.

Forgetting God

THERE is an old fable of the Jews which has a deep and awful meaning. There lived on the shores of the Dead Sea a certain tribe of men utterly given up to pleasure and covetousness—the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. To them the prophet Moses was sent to warn them of righteousness and judgment to come, trying to awaken their souls to high and holy thoughts, and bring them back to the thought of God and heaven. And they listened to him, admired his preaching, and agreed that all sounded very good. But they said he went too far; that it was too difficult; that their present way of life was very pleasant, and they saw no great need of change. At length they began to be tired of Moses, and gave him to understand that he was impertinent, troublesome, and that they could see nothing wise or great in him.

So Moses went his way. And long afterwards, when some travelers passed by that way, says the fable, they found these foolish people all changed into dumb beasts. What they had tried to be they now really were. They had made no use of their souls, and now they had lost them. They had given themselves up to folly, and now folly had taken to herself her own. They had fancied, as people do every day, that this world is a playground, where every one has to amuse himself as he likes best; or a great shop or gambling house, where the most cunning wins most of his neighbor's money; and now according to their faith it was unto them. They had forgotten God and spiritual things, and now they were hid from their eyes. And these travelers found them sitting, playing antics, or quarreling for the fruits of the field—mere beasts, reaping as they had sown, and filled full with the fruits of their own devices.

Only, every Sabbath day there came over the poor wretches an awful sense of a piercing Eye watching them from above; a dim feeling that they had been something better and nobler once; a faint recollection of heavenly things which they once knew when they were little children; a blind dread of some terrible unseen ruin into which their miserable, empty beast-life was swiftly and steadily sweeping them down. And then they tried to think, and could not; and tried to remember, and could not. And so they sat there every Sabbath day, cowering with fear, uneasy and moaning, and half remembered that they once had souls.

Alas! how many in our day are like those dwellers by the Dead Sea, seeming to have lost all God's image except their bodies; who all the week dote on the business and the pleasures of this life, going on in indulgence till they have quite hardened their hearts and debased their souls; and now and then on Sabbath days, when they come to church, professing to pray and worship, sit vacant, dull, their hearts far away; or with a sort of passing uneasiness and dim feeling that all is not right, try to think, and cannot; try to pray, and cannot, and, like those beast-men of the fable, half remember that they once had souls!

Warnings of War

OMINOUS were the words that the Secretary of War used in his address to the graduating class at West Point Military Academy on June 12. "You are members," he said, "not only of the regular army, but of a body which, when war comes, as it is sure to come, will form only a part, a nucleus of a greater army of regular militia and volunteers." Mr. Root would be one of the last men to claim the functions of a prophet, but he is a sagacious, far-sighted man, who sees in the present condition of the world elements which, in his opinion, will culminate in conflict. It is unlikely that he has special knowledge of any disputes now in progress, that menace the peace of the country, but he perceives that such disputes are likely to arise, and that, however peaceful and tactful our Government may be, it is more than probable that it will be involved. The speeches of the President and other distinguished men on the same occasion, though less positive than that of Secretary Root, all indicated the same opinion, and implied that the young men who have been trained to a soldier's duty, were not unlikely in the future to have their mettle put to the proof.

We may be quite sure that there was not one of the speakers who would not consider the outbreak of war as a calamity. If it should come, it will be regarded on all hands as a stern necessity, as the only way of preserving our national honor. But how barbarous it all is! How irrational! As if the conflict of one set of men with another could prove the righteousness of a cause. Time was when everywhere an allegation of one man against another was submitted to the arbitrament of the sword. In all lands, as in many to this day, a man charged with some meanness or disgraceful conduct, felt bound in honor to fight a duel with his accuser. But when the duel had been fought, and one man had killed the other, the thing proved was not the innocence or guilt of the accused, but whether this or that man was the better shot or swordsman. So, in war; the thing proved is not whether the claim of a nation is just, but that one army is stronger, or better handled, than the other. The absurdity of the duel has become so obvious to ourselves, that we have ceased to appeal to arms in individual disputes, and instead, take the more sensible course of appealing to the courts. How long must it be before the same principle is applied to international disputes?

There is only too valid reason to believe that Secretary Root's prediction will be verified, for, to the end, "there will be wars and rumors of wars," and we have now attained as a nation a position so prominent, that we cannot hope to keep ourselves clear of the trouble. But this we may do: We may teach the rising generation that war is a gigantic evil, that it is a clumsy and brutal way of redressing wrong, and that only in the extremest cases, and when all other honorable means of vindicating right and justice have been tried and have failed, is it justifiable. That such teaching is necessary is proved by history. It is a notorious fact that many rulers have been forced into war by the clamor of their own people, and that in nearly every international dispute the people are more desirous of war than their leaders. We should set the example of counteracting this tendency by the training of our young people to hold war in abhorrence, so that in our own land at any rate, there shall be no danger of a demand for war so imperative as to disturb the calm judgment of our Government.

The Value of Struggle

WE commend to the thoughtful attention of parents everywhere the timely and suggestive discussion in "The Mail-Bag" department of this issue. It is by no means an easy or a thankful task to convince a father and mother that their loving solicitude for their children's welfare may become a stumbling-block, leading to ultimate disaster. The disposition to shield the child from every blast and buffet of adverse fortune; to make all its tasks easy of solution; to lighten its burdens, and smooth the pathway of life for its tender feet, is a perfectly natural one. But there is a point beyond which this parental solicitude becomes a positive danger. Self-reliance, individuality, the sense of personal honor and integrity, independence of action, decision of character, must be encouraged, otherwise the boy or girl will grow up a physical, mental and moral weakling.

Some time ago, the two sons of a Western millionaire were questioned concerning their views of life. They candidly admitted that they knew very little about it, never having shared its trials nor enjoyed its triumphs. All their wishes had been gratified and even anticipated. They had lacked for nothing. They were securely shielded and guarded and hemmed in from danger on all sides. If they went on the street, a vigilant paid attendant shadowed them for their protection, and to see that they came to no mischance. Even the smallest offices were performed for them. Their tutors were ordered to be easy with them, and as a result, their education was superficial and incomplete. Through a youth wholly free from struggle and contest, they grew up to manhood, children in all save years and inches, and babes in experience in the world's ways. When they observed the vigorous independence and self-reliance of other young men, who had been trained by actual contact with life and its problems, they were deeply dissatisfied with their own lives. They realized that excessive parental care had made of them mere "hot-house plants," utterly unfitted for stress and struggle and incapable of achievement. All that gave zest and enjoyment to others in the battle was to them denied. They had wholly missed the experience most essential to development.

In the spiritual life, too, as in the material and intellectual, early contact with actual conditions is the best means of developing those high qualities of soul that "mark the perfect man." Many a parent has discovered too late, that the spiritual training which is neglected in childhood is rarely, if ever, wholly redeemed in adult years. On the other hand, the sons and daughters of earnest, practical Christian fathers and mothers, who have impressed upon their childhood the importance of personal duty and individual moral responsibility, are on the right road that leads to spiritual growth and efficient service. "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth," wrote the prophet, and the words of Jeremiah are as true to-day as when he gave them utterance. No child can go through life successfully on the experience of its parents. It must be taught unaided to struggle and to conquer, and the sooner the lesson is learned, the better. The greatest victories of earth and heaven are reached through the fiercest struggle.

Belief in Prayer

A MAN says he cannot understand prayer, and he does not believe it puts us in communication with the unseen world. He has weighed it in material balances, he has tried it by mechanical tests, and he has found it wanting. And no wonder. He is like a man who takes up a horse-shoe magnet, turns it over and feels it carefully, lifts it to his nose, touches it with his tongue, examines it with his microscope, and then flings it away as a worthless scrap of iron. He has left undone the one thing that would prove its value—he has not used it.

No wonder that the invisible world is unreal to a man who only views prayer from without, who stands around and talks about it, and looks at it by the feeble light of his glowworm philosophy. He who knows prayer as an experience, from within the circle of communion with God; who has lingered in that heavenly atmosphere "seeing Him who is invisible," asking and receiving, feeling his burdens drop off and his strength renew itself—he can afford to smile at the philosopher outside, knitting his brows over the question whether a man can ask and can receive anything from God.

Among the Workers

—REV. A. R. SETTON of Garfield, Mo., has just closed a very successful revival at Elvins, St. Francois Co., Mo.

—PRESIDENT C. E. ARNOLD of McPherson College, Kansas, is in the hospital at Kansas City, suffering from internal cancer.

—EVANGELIST SKELLIE, of Cambridge, N. Y., is now conducting a series of evangelistic services in the Adirondack towns and villages.

—A REMARKABLE revival is reported from Kankakee, Ill., under the leadership of the Rev. E. J. Bulgin, D. D., and Professor Montgomery.

—QUEEN ALEXANDRA will give a tea to 10,000 English servant girls, and will have a gift for each. Britain, like other countries, has a servant-girl problem, and the Queen possibly may aid in settling it.

—F. W. ATKINSON, General Superintendent of Public Instruction in the Philippines, writes that the American teachers are proving a very important factor in the changing of conditions there. They seem to enjoy the work, despite discomforts and hardships.

—REV. M. A. MATTHEWS, D.D., took charge of the First Presbyterian Church of Seattle on February 1. The work is showing marked progress. A new mission church has been completed and dedicated. One hundred and ninety new members have been received in three months.

—REV. R. A. TORREY, of the Moody Institute, Chicago, has lately been holding great religious meetings in Melbourne, Australia. Fifty picked workers are aiding him, and simultaneous meetings are held in many different centres. Audiences of 3,000 and over, crowd the Melbourne Town Hall. A great revival throughout Australia is expected. Nearly two hundred churches in the city of Melbourne joined in the movement, and "home" meetings were organized for special prayer for the mission, meeting in the homes each Tuesday evening. It is estimated that at least 6,000 prayer meetings were held, with an attendance of over 75,000 Christians.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Desolation in Martinique

RECENT reports from persons who have ventured to visit the stricken island of Martinique contain shocking details of the scenes they have witnessed. The desolation is utter and unmitigated. Fragments of imposing buildings stand in isolation, raising their heads above prostrate walls, while large areas once covered by substantial dwellings are now a mere stone yard, not one stone upon another. Everywhere corpses lie as they fell, the work of collecting and burning them being interrupted by periodic panics of fresh eruptions from the muttering volcano. Like a monster in agony, it groans and shudders, and at frequent intervals sends up fresh clouds of pulverized stone. A photograph on this page shows all that is left of the United States consulate. Mr. Prentis, the consul, had many opportunities of escape, but like so many others, did not believe there was danger. The body of Mr. Prentis was found near the house and was buried with military honors. Near the Town Hall the bodies of nine policemen were found, who had died at the post of duty. In and around the cathedral the bodies were most numerous, the people having evidently made a rush for the edifice, with the common belief that it would afford the best protection. It is some consolation to believe that death must have been almost instantaneous. The foul gases from the crater asphyxiated the victims, sparing them the heard in practically continuous rumble, punctuated by their shrill whistles. Sirens from the river and various factories rose sharp and clear. Most noticeable were the barking of high-voiced dogs, which could be distinctly heard even at a mile high. The highly instructive fact was noted, however, that though the city was crossed just at noon, when from the streets the striking of clocks and bells is always such a noticeable feature, yet the most careful listener aloft could detect no sound of this description. These observations go to prove how inferior are the carrying powers of bells as heard from aloft, and to emphasize the fact that sounds of an damages. The decision of the final court is that he was perfectly justified in staying where he was hurt after being warned. He had a right to be there, but the warning he had received, and had not heeded, precluded him from getting damages for his injuries. The presumption was that he accepted the risk of remaining after the danger had been pointed out to him. The contractor had no right to remove him by force, and had fully performed his duty when he had told him of the peril he was in. The same principle operates in spiritual matters. The right of free will is respected, and it is open to every man to reject the warnings and into speculating. Old acquaintances enjoyed seeing him prospering and gave him judicious advice. His capital grew rapidly. He looked forward to being a millionaire. He no longer thought it necessary to take advice, but arranged his speculative ventures according to his own ideas. There came then a change of fortune and everything he touched failed. Still he continued, hoping, as he said, that his luck would change. It did not, and two weeks ago he found himself reduced to his last dollar. Then he took his old kit and went back to his old work in the City Hall. The man shed tears as he told his story, and dwelt on the great hopes and ambitions which had seemed so sure, but had come to naught. He had learned the truth written a thousand years ago, which so many before him have realized to their sorrow.

He that hasteth to be rich hath an evil eye, and considereth not that poverty shall come upon him (Prov. 28: 22).

BRIEF NOTES

The British and Foreign Bible Society is maturing plans for an impressive observance of its centenary in 1904.

Eleven Protestant denominations are now represented in evangelizing work in Cuba. The number of communicants is 2,263, and the children in Sunday Schools 3,203.

The total receipts of the American Bible Society for the year 1901-02 were $433,473, a considerable increase on the figures of the preceding year. The aggregate of the year's issues was 1,723,000 volumes, of which a little more than one-third were distributed in the United States. The remainder went to foreign mission countries.

horror of being burned to death. It is a curious coincidence that a popular magazine this month contains an article by one of our most eminent scientists, written evidently before the Martinique disaster, in which he says that the earth's volcanic energy has long been steadily decreasing and appears to be now almost exhausted. He must now see reason to revise that opinion, as so many other scientific assertions have had to be revised. People who have been inclined to trust science rather than the Bible should note this fact.

We have a more sure word of prophecy: whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place (II Peter 1: 19).

Penetrating Sounds

A number of scientists have been making a series of experiments to test the relative penetrating quality of sounds. The English Government lent them a military balloon, which ascended from the artillery camp at Woolwich and passed over the city of London. A sharp ear was kept for the sounds of the vast city that penetrated upward. Trains were unmusical, discordant nature, have much better chance of making themselves heard at a distance than have more harmonious noises. Happily, it is not so that sounds reach into the heavens. Harmonious utterance is more effectual in that case than discord.

If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father who is in heaven (Matt. 18: 19).

Did Not Heed Warning

An action for damages for injuries has been carried through the Courts of New York State up to the Court of Appeals, which has just handed down a judgment. It appears that the plaintiff, walking through Fourth avenue, New York, stayed on a temporary bridge to look at the work being done in the subway. One of the workmen told him to move on, as he was liable to be hurt; but the man replied that he had a right to be on the public street, and refused to go. A few minutes later he was struck on the head by a piece of iron, which flew from a pipe that was being cut in two, and was severely hurt. He accordingly sued for vitations of the Gospel. It is the man's own soul that is involved, and if he allows it to go to destruction he alone must bear the penalty.

He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning; his blood shall be upon him. But he that taketh warning shall deliver his soul (Ezek. 33: 5).

A Shoeblack's Fortune

There was some surprise in the City Hall Park, New York, last week, when Herman, the Mayor's shoeblack, made his appearance there with a regular kit soliciting business. It was understood that Herman had retired on a fortune, but he seemed poorer than ever. To an old acquaintance he told the story of a sudden rise and fall. He had enjoyed the patronage of four mayors in succession, and had shined the shoes of aldermen, who in exuberant spirits paid liberally for his attentions. He managed to save $46, and through the kindness of a patron secured a tip in speculation which turned his hoard into $300. Then he sought more tips, and his hundreds grew into thousands. He abandoned the shoeblack business and devoted himself exclusively

At the recent conference at Lake Mohonk on International Arbitration, it was stated that while during the first decade of the last century no dispute was settled by arbitration, and in the first thirty years only six, in the closing ten years sixty-six international disputes were peaceably adjusted.

The Society of Friends is establishing an industrial mission in Africa. At a meeting recently held at Cleveland, O., three young men bade farewell to the society to set forth as pioneers of the mission, and will explore the interior of Africa in a field that has never been touched by missionaries and establish a colony, where agriculture will be taught the natives and also Christianity.

An Interdenominational Bible Conference will be held at Lake Orion, Mich., July 18-28. The Conference there last year was largely attended and proved a source of rich blessing. The arrangements for this year promise an even greater treat to those who attend it. Among the speakers are to be Dr. John F. Carson, Dr. Wayland Hoyt, Dr. Wm. T. McDowell and Major James H. Cole. Further information may be obtained by addressing the Secretary of the Conference, 1201 Chamber of Commerce, Detroit, Mich.

A reception was given recently by the Board of Managers of the Women's Union Missionary Society as a welcome to Miss S. D. Doremus, who has just returned from an extensive tour in India, China and Japan, during which she visited the stations of the Society. She bears the most cordial good wishes and words of grateful remembrance to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers from the orphanage of the Society, at Cawnpore, where she saw large numbers of children who are supported by them.

THE BIRTHPLACE OF JOSEPHINE

By Margaret E. Sangster

JOSEPHINE is not an uncommon name, but it derives for us its most queenly association from the beautiful Creole wife of the First Napoleon, a woman whose charm, grace, tact, and misfortunes have become traditional. When, a few weeks ago, the terrible volcanic eruption at Martinique laid waste an island, and thousands perished in the flood of fire and death, there were some of us whose geographical knowledge was so slender that we could not at once remember much about St. Pierre. But we had an association that helped us out. "Why, don't you know," I heard a gentleman say to a friend, "that's the place where the Empress Josephine was born." We give a picture of the house in which the child, who was to have so strange a mingling of life's glory and life's woes, first saw the light of earth.

Josephine was thirty-three years old, and the widow of the Vicomte Beauharnais, when she married the youthful Napoleon, then twenty-six and a bachelor. The wedding-day was March 9, 1796. Napoleon Bonaparte was already famous, and he was to be the Conqueror of Europe. Josephine was called Citizeness Bonaparte at first. She was to be raised to the proud pre-eminence of the throne, wear a crown, and the title of Empress. It seems probable, in the revelations of later days, that she was a shallow coquette, and though the genius of Napoleon was magnificent, he was capable of an immense pettiness. Though his love for her was at first an adoration, it cooled in time, and he wearied of her extravagance and caprices. She, on the other hand, loved him more devotedly in the latter days of life than at first, her love surviving the cruel wrench of the divorce, which with her childless condition as a pretext, Napoleon sundered their union. With the divorce of Josephine and Napoleon's subsequent marriage to Marie Louise of Austria, his star waned. Napoleon died in exile at St. Helena, but it was his divorced wife, and not the Austrian Princess who, had she been permitted, would have shared his desolate imprisonment.

According to St. Amand, Napoleon owed some of his rapid advancement to the diplomacy of Josephine, "She prepared the field in which he was to show himself the master."

From the little house in Martinique to the Tuileries—what a step! To the happy West Indian child, how little was revealed of the destiny before her. Her daughter, Hortense Beauharnais, married one of Napoleon's brothers, and it was her grandson who became Napoleon the Third, husband of that beautiful Empress Eugenie, who once set the fashions for the world. The child of Marie Louise did not succeed his brilliant father. He died in early youth.

BRIGHT AND SWEET THE FLOWER TO-DAY

BRIGHT and sweet the flower to-day,
Withered on the morrow;
Naught is left of beauty, then,— Dying, to our sorrow.

Bright and sweet the flower to-day
Lovely, e'en in shadow;
Makes some place so fair indeed,
Plain or vale or meadow.

Bright and sweet the flower to-day,
Found in nook, so hidden,

BIRTHPLACE OF EMPRESS JOSEPHINE, ST. PIERRE, MARTINIQUE

When here a little child she played,
Her old nurse dreamed that she would wear
A crown upon her golden head,
And sit upon a golden chair.

Messages of tender love,
Here to bloom 'twas bidden.

Bright and sweet the flower to-day,
Though from stem soon riven,
Sure we are, that blooms above,
Wait for us in heaven.

SAVED

THERE is told the story of a beautiful child, a boy of three years, who strayed from his nurse to the great ocean's bed, and there, gathering in his tiny hands the stray shells washed in by the tide, he wandered on, until a great, swelling wave dashed over him, and carried him away on its bosom. No one had witnessed the act but the great, noble Newfoundland, belonging to the master, who had not once left the child's side, and it was but the work of a moment to rescue the form, and bring it to shore. An hour later they were discovered, the child lying at the feet of the dog, who was watching over him with all the love and tenderness possible. His great head was lifted high, and his eyes full of speechless pity. In his mute language, he seemed to say, "Saved! Saved! Saved!"

We are all children of larger or smaller growth, and sometimes we are so intent upon enjoyment that we stray away into dangerous places. In our hands we clutch the fleeting enjoyments of the hour, our eyes are fixed thereon, and we do not see the mighty, swelling tide rapidly bearing down upon us. Then the tide breaks, the waves wash at our feet, and we find ourselves drifting far away. But there comes to us the voice of the Almighty, calling us tenderly by name, and reaching to us the hand of love. Shall we accept it or shall we drift away deeper and deeper into sin, until we are hopelessly lost? Oh, it is not too late to come. May it be said of you, Saved! Saved! Saved!

Two Old Lovers

They were seventy odd, and the man had the stooping shoulders and musing countenance, with shrewd eyes under bushy brows, of one who has lived on his own land, and tilled it for many a year. The wife was tall, thin, angular, and kindly-faced. You saw how used she was to her kitchen, her buttery, and her own pew in church. They had not been away from home in forty years, and they had now been all the way from Vermont to Nebraska. To see their daughter Jane, of course. And now they were homeward bound. The old husband and the old wife, on a belated honeymoon, lovers still; and contented in each other's company.

In Traveling

On the road, people reveal their real natures. The cross and fretful woman, who cannot endure a slight discomfort; the other woman, who calmly deposits her bags and bundles on a seat for which she has not paid, while a passenger stands in the aisle vainly looking for a place; and the third, who opens or closes windows with a view only to her personal convenience, are all typical. Rudeness and boorishness are never more disagreeable than when shown on a journey. Amiability and loveliness never shine more radiantly than in the same circumstances.

HER LIFE FOR A FLOWER

LITTLE Carrie, child of the tenements, had a flower. She tended it faithfully, and rejoiced greatly as leaves put forth and buds unfolded. There are East Side children who have never played on the grass and never owned a plant. Carrie's flower was her greatest treasure. One night, as the Brooklyn Eagle reported next day, Carrie, leaning over the window-sill to watch her flower, disturbed it, and it fell. Reaching after it, she lost her balance, and fell too. Down among the startled children fell the flower, and with it the tiny body of the child. The Bellevue doctor came, looked at the broken flower and the broken baby, and said: "Both dead!"

Only those who work among the tenement children know their longing for flowers and for green fields to play in. But they often long for more serious needs—for bread and raiment. They must work, and help pay rent; they sell papers, and black boots, and carry sewing and washing home. It is only fair that in summer they have a little play-time on the grass. Beautiful Mont-Lawn, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home exists for such as these, and many hundreds of little folks as needy as the two small maids in our picture will soon be romping over the blossoming fields and hillsides, and gathering handfuls of flowers. Plenty of good food, downy cots to sleep in, and loving watch-care over them will be their happy portion for at least ten glad days. They will be clothed, too, in neat garments. Better, perhaps, than all, they will be taught about Jesus' love for children; and instructed to carry their troubles to that powerful Friend, and to thank him for the blessings his servants bring into their lives. Many generous friends of these children of the poor are co-operating with us in our work for these little ones, as gifts like the following testify:

"CAN WE GO TO MONT-LAWN?"

of the best of all good causes. E. G. H., Pittsburg, Pa., $21: To support a cot for the summer at Mont-Lawn. T. D. D., Amagansett, L. I., $21: To make a fair white bed for some little waifs at beautiful Mont-Lawn. Mrs. G. G. H., Suffern, N. J., $21: Given to sustain a cot to be called "Sunshine Cot," in the name of my branch, the "Joyful Workers."

"Sunshine" is a very pretty name for a cot. "Daisy Cot" is pretty, too:

Mrs. E. C. G., Rutherford, N. J.: It is with great pleasure the Daisy Band send you $21, receipts from a little sale they have been working for all winter. Sickness interfered very much with our band and we thought under the circumstances if we could send two children to Mont-Lawn this summer we would be satisfied. When, lo! we find we can support a cot. God bless Mont-Lawn and all who are working for the children.

Only $3 gives a waif a happy ten-day holiday at Mont-Lawn; $6 sends two; $9, three, and so on; $30 sends twelve—a whole colony. From many letters promising help to our little ones in this way, the following extracts are taken as typical of all:

A Widow, S. I., $1. God love the little ones and bless the workers.—S. C. and wife, Utah, Mo., $5. Our yearly mite, God's blessing on the children.—Cora and Bessie, $3. We would like to send more, but we are young yet; this money we earned partly by working.—M. E. W., $4 to make three children happy in memory of my dear mother, who always remembered the little ones.

Most of Mont-Lawn's guests are exceedingly needy as to raiment. Many who come have not a change of garments—have not even one complete set. Any articles of wearing apparel that more fortunate children have outgrown will be welcome. Hats, coats, shoes, blouses, dresses, aprons, nightgowns and night-drawers are in demand. If our friends who sustain cots, care to provide sleeping garments for these children, the little folks will thankfully receive them.

Cash contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York; children's garments to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y., will be promptly acknowledged.

WINNING CHILDREN TO CHRIST

FOR the last year and a half, the Rev. E. Payson Hammond, whose Gospel work among children is widely known, has been holding meetings in New York, Brooklyn, and New Jersey. On Sunday, June 1, he conducted four services in a branch church of the Presbyterian Fifth Avenue Church, Sixty-third st., New York, Rev. F. B. Everett, acting pastor. Mr. Wilde and Mr. Edwards, of Newark, gave some account of the results of four series of meetings that Mr. Hammond had held at different times in that city. This stirred up the people to earnest prayer for the presence and power of the Holy Spirit, and the pastor, the Rev. F. B. Everett, held preparatory services. On the afternoon of Sunday the presence of the Holy Spirit was manifest, and many were under conviction. A number of teachers were present from the parent church, formerly Dr. John Hall's Church, where the General Assembly met a few weeks ago. After the lifting up of Christ and him crucified, Mr. Hammond conducted an inquiry meeting, to which nearly all remained. Some of these workers had been reading Mr. Hammond's book Early Conversion (of which about one hundred thousand copies are now in circulation), and they were thus in a way prepared, with their open Bibles on their knees, to speak words that would assist the young who were anxious about their souls to come to Jesus. At the close of the inquiry meeting, it was found that one hundred and forty-four expressed the belief that they had repented of their sins and believed in Jesus. The next day a similar meeting was held, and a larger number—one hundred and sixty—professed conversion. The pastor and audience at the last evening meeting for adults, praised God earnestly for what he had done in answer to prayer. Very likely some names were given in of children who had not entirely given themselves to Jesus; but it was evident that a deep impression was made, and many were convicted of sin and led to Christ. The meeting was given up to testimonies from the workers as to their confidence in the genuineness of the work.

When people read accounts of meetings where many old and young profess conversion, the natural question arises, "But is it genuine?" "Is it excitement, or is it the work of the Holy Spirit, blessing the Church through the pure Gospel, leading young and old to see their lost condition and to put their trust in Christ?" In the recent meetings which Mr. Hammond has held, that question has been repeatedly answered. Numbers have risen at these meetings and told the story of their conversion in previous meetings which Mr. Hammond conducted in different places. In a meeting which Mr. Hammond held in Newark, N. J., in 1863, 1,300 children from the Sunday School alone joined different churches, and at one of the recent meetings in New York, a gentleman testified that he believed the great majority of these young people had been kept, by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, and were still testifying by their lives that it was indeed the work of God's Spirit which changed their hearts. A minister in Providence, R. I., where Mr. Hammond held meetings, writes:

35 WESTFIELD ST., PROVIDENCE, R. I.

April 15, 1902.

DEAR BROTHER HAMMOND:—You will be interested to know that the precious influence that came upon your opening meeting that afternoon with the children, held in the church, is still with us. Though a year has passed since the service, the children and young people well remember the meetings, and are still singing and saying the prayer you taught them. Some of the brightest Christians in my church date their conversions from those services. Every one of them converted in your meetings, so far as I know, is trying to live the Christian life today. I believe most decidedly that the children converted in your meetings, and who sign covenant cards, hold out in the Christian life far better than those who are converted at adult age in revival meetings.

S. A. BLAISDELL.

A lady arose in one of the meetings, who is at the head of a mission for young people in that locality, and said that last year Mr. Hammond's book, Early Conversion, was given to her. She and the other teachers studied it, and began to labor for the conversion of their children. She was confident that twenty-four children and young people had, through the influence of that book, been led to Christ. The Rev. W. C. Bauch, elder in a Presbyterian Church in New York City, said that last winter Mr. Hammond was holding meetings in Dr. Louis Albert Banks' church, in New York City. In that meeting which Mr. Hammond held in Dr. Banks' church, between one and two hundred professed conversion, and he had since heard that most of them gave evidence that they had experienced a genuine change of heart.

Mr. Hammond has probably seen a longer term of active evangelistic service than any man now living. His efforts at winning children have been signally blessed, and large numbers of adults date their first start in the Christian life from their attendance on his services.

REST ON THE REST DAY

THE GIVING OF THE MANNA

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 6
EXODUS 16: 4-16

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- MATT. 6: 11:
"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD"

WE have just completed a six-months' study of the "early Church" of New Testament times, and are now to enter upon a six-months' study of the earlier Old Testament Church. We find the people we are to study two millions in number. They have "no continuing city," but are journeying from the bondage of Egypt toward the Promised Land, which God had said should be theirs. Thirty days have passed since they left Egypt, and their food supply is almost exhausted. They see no way of replenishing it in the wilderness where they are. "Go into your yesterdays to find God" was not their motto, but instead, they took counsel with their fears. They had forgotten that God had brought them out of Egypt with a strong hand, having cleared the way for them even by the death of their enemies, as that dread night when the first-born lay dead in every home in Egypt, and again at the crossing of the Red Sea, when Pharaoh's pursuing host were swallowed up. They did not look into these yesterdays to find God when they thought themselves forsaken in the wilderness. Murmurings were on lips that should have been given to praise and prayer. Doubt, instead of trust, filled their hearts. They were not yet hungry, only they feared they might be. For the time being, they seemed to consider Moses and Aaron their enemies, because they had been their leaders in the exodus from Egypt. They said, "Ye have brought us forth into this wilderness to kill this whole assembly with hunger." And they actually wished themselves back in Egypt, in hard bondage, that they might have enough to eat for the morrow. They seemed to be finding fault with Moses and Aaron, but they were really finding fault with God. "I will rain bread from heaven," said God to Moses. "I will send it fresh every day, and there shall be enough for everyone, but none to waste." The quantity was six pints for each person, 375,000 bushels daily, and on the day before the Sabbath, twice as much, that there might be no work done on the rest day, a lesson in Sabbath-keeping that has been followed ever since in Christian homes where food for the Lord's Day is prepared on Saturday, so far as possible.

There would certainly have been found some in that company selfish enough to gather more than their daily portion on other days, in order to store it up, had not God made it impossible for them to do so. Some, indeed, did try to save a portion for the morrow, fearing in their unbelief that the supply might fail, but it was of no use, for they found it filled with worms on the second day. That was God's way of curbing their selfishness, and teaching them to trust him. It was the beginning of the prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread." But what of the portion which they gathered the day before the Sabbath? Marvelous to tell, by the power of God it was kept sweet and wholesome. More wonderful still, six pints of it, one person's portion, was kept for many years, and put in the golden ark, which was afterwards built, that the people might never forget how good their God had been to them. Not for one week only, not for one month, not for one year, but for forty years, did God thus give his people "bread from heaven," until they came into the Land of Promise, where they could plant grain, from which to make their own bread.

And God gave them yet daintier food, sending also tender quails, even now considered a toothsome morsel. He caused great flocks of them to come and settle in the midst of the people, when they were easily caught. And doubtless God so fed his people, not once only but again and again (Num. 11). How can we ever forget that all our food really comes from God, not only the necessities, but the luxuries, which should prompt a prayer whenever and wherever we eat.

Illustration and Application

Many truths may be taught from this story of the manna, for example:

1. Our daily bread comes from God.
2. Christ is heavenly bread for the soul (John 6: 49-51).
3. The Sabbath is a day of heaven on earth.

The Children of Israel murmured. v. 2. They were not really "children," but surely childish in these murmurings.

Loud Murmurings and Short Memories
They should have said, He who led us through the sea, will lead us through the wilderness. Even a child would not be so afraid that a father who had brought him safely through many dangers would fail him in a new time of need. The Church is still full of grown-up children who have many fears and little faith. God has provided for every need in the past, but in each new test they doubt or murmur. "Remember, all the way the Lord thy God led thee," and "Be not afraid, only believe." Even Marcus Aurelius shames those in whom the soul loses heart before the body.

During the most unpleasant period of the Boxer rebellion in China, Li Hung Chang appeared to be quite cheerful, in spite of trials crowding upon him. An American legation attaché asked him one day for the secret of his courageous conduct, to whom Li gave a reply in the form of an ancient Chinese proverb: "You cannot prevent birds of sorrow flying over your head, but you can keep them from stopping and building nests in your hair."

If philosophy can thus silence murmuring, true faith can turn it into song.

Day by day the manna fell;
O to learn this lesson well:
Still by constant mercy fed,
Give us, Lord, our daily bread.

Day by day the promise reads;
Daily strength for daily needs:
Cast foreboding fears away,
Take the manna of to-day.

Thou our daily task shalt give
Day by day to Thee we live:
So shall added years fulfil,
Not our own, our Father's will

O to live exempt from care
By the energy of prayer;
Strong in faith, with mind subdued,
Glowing yet with gratitude.

I will rain bread from heaven for you. Follow back any article of food to its source and you find God. Daily bread is "bread from heaven." We may well repeat often the quickening questions to our children: "Who gives you bread?" "Mother." "And who gives it to mother?" "The baker." "And who gives it to the baker?" "The miller." "And who gives it to the miller?" "The farmer." "And who gives it to the farmer?" "The ground." "And who gives it to the ground?" "GOD." And so when we follow back the meats it is the Creator of the quails who again is back of it all. Much of the meat in Jewish meals and in heathen as well come from the altars of sacrifice. They are worse than heathen, lacking not only piety but even politeness, who sit down to a table, which is but the old altar in a new form, with no prayer of thanks sung or spoken or even in silence to the divine Giver of all.

But it is a greater blindness when men refuse even to partake of the "hidden manna," the bread of the soul, the hidden support of the hidden life. With this story of the manna should be read the story of a like miracle and its spiritual meaning in the sixth chapter of John. Multitudes followed Christ when he had fed the five thousand with miraculous loaves and fishes, but when he told them they must receive his own spirit of unselfishness in their hearts as spiritual manna from heaven, they left him almost alone. Dr. Lyman Abbott thus sums up the significance of the heavenly manna: "Christ is not earth-born but heavenly descended. Christianity is not a choice flower which has grown up out of the earth; it is a gift from heaven. The New Testament is not built by men's hands; it descends out of heaven to men. The Christian religion is not the last and highest achievement of human development; it is the hand of Almighty God reached down out of heaven to lift man up and set him in heavenly places. To be a Christian is not merely to do right; it is to be born again; it is to be endowed with a new and heavenly life, the gift of God."

How is Christ like the manna? Because both are (1) God-given, (2) easily obtained, (3) to be taken by each for himself day by day, (4) sufficient, (5) adapted for all.

On the sixth day it shall be twice as much as they gather daily. Here we find the Sabbath prepared for on each recurring sixth day before the Ten Commandments were given at Sinai, where many careless Bible readers suppose it originated. The very word "Remember," at the opening of the Commandment points back to the institution as something which had been in existence previously which men were even then prone to forget. Men who act as if the Sabbath was made for money, try to make it appear that it is only a Jewish law, not given till the race had existed twenty-five hundred years, and then only to a peculiar people. This story of the manna leads us back one stage from the Decalogue to an older Sabbath observance, and the references to "seven days" in the story of the flood and in the story of Laban are further recognitions of the week on back to creation, where we find the clear historic statement that the Sabbath Day in man's little week is a memorial of God's rest in the great creation week in which a thousand years may have been as one day. There was some excuse for those who doubted the existence of the Sabbath before the Jews, when the slight references in Genesis were all the evidence in sight. But now all reasonable doubt is banished by two lines of confirming proof:

First, in the oldest records of the oldest nations, notably, the tablets of the Accadians, the immediate descendants of Noah, it is found not only that the week existed, but also that the 7th, 14th, 21st and 28th days of each month, seven days apart, were called by the very name, Sabbatu, and certain forms of work were forbidden on that day. Revelation declares that the Sabbath was made for man, not for the Jew only.

And reason and science confirm their declaration. Why should any one suppose God would sentence a man to fifty-two days of added labor a year for being born a Gentile? Hath not a Gentile muscles that need rest, and a mind that needs a day for thought, and a heart that needs a day for fellowship, and a soul that needs a day for worship, as well as a Jew? In recent years science has shown that the law of the Sabbath is the law of nature written in the body as well as the Bible.

Hundreds of physicians have so testified, but the case has been proved by special experiments by Haegele, of Basle, Germany, and Prof. C. F. Hodge, of our own Clark University, at Worcester, Mass. Rev. Henry S. Baker, Ph.D., writing of Professor Hodge's experiments on the nerve cells, says: "We are apt to think that a rest of twelve hours with a sleep of about eight, fully recuperates us after a day of hard work at physical or mental labor, or both." The microscope shows such a view to be wrong. Even twenty-four hours is not quite enough time, strange as it may seem. The microscope shows that more than thirty hours, possibly thirty-three or thirty-six, are needed to restore a cell to its proper size and condition after severe fatigue. In other words, man is so made that he needs a Sabbath from Saturday evening to Monday morning of complete rest to be as good as new. Without this, he is never at his best, physically, mentally, morally, or spiritually. So we find the Fourth Commandment in the nineteenth century echoed from the biological laboratory with tremendous emphasis, and again we are compelled to admit that he who spoke at Sinai must have made the brain-cell and understood its secret working. Again, is our faith made firmer that the Old Book is not wholly man-made.

This testimony of science is a welcome re-enforcement at this time, when the Sabbath is more attacked and less defended than ever before, and when even spiritual Christians, who are not even strongly tempted to break any other Commandment, use Sunday trains, and get Sunday mail.

and otherwise violate the law of God, and not infrequently even the civil Sunday law. But let us keep in mind that there are seven reasons at least why the Sabbath should be observed and preserved as a day of freedom for worship and from work, save works of necessity and mercy: 1. Because the law of the Sabbath is the law of Eden, where the Sabbath was made for man as the crowning work of creation, the germ of all things spiritual. 2. Because the law of the Sabbath is a part of the Decalogue, the world's universal constitution. 3. Because it is also the law of Christ, who taught its observance by precept and practice. 4. Because the observance of the new Sabbath, the Lord's Day, is the law of apostolic example. 5. Because it is the law of the Church. 6. Because it is the law of the State. 7. Because it is also a law of nature, scientifically proven.

We are told that the complicated civilization of modern times requires that Sabbath observance and Sabbath laws should be relaxed. Nay, this is a new reason why they should be maintained and strengthened. Did Adam, to whom the Sabbath law of work and rest was given before the fall—did he, who knew nothing of "cut-throat competition," and "soulless corporations," and had no master but God, need a Sabbath law more than we do to-day, when sin has put its curse into the Edenic blessing of labor? At Sinai, where the Sabbath law was proclaimed, did those Hebrew herders, moving on at three miles an hour, need a law to protect them against overstrain more than the engineers of to-day, who drive their iron dragons a mile a minute, with hand on the throttle, eye on the track, every power alert?

Surely, we should do something more than guard our personal relation to the Lord's day. We must join with others in Sabbath defense committees in every community, for the peril of this palladium of religion and liberty is a peril to all that is best in human society.

When nearly all the work was in the open air, in forest and field, was there more need to protect the toilers' right to one day's release from labor than now, when many thousands work at night and in the mine, and thousands more in stifling shops?

A VETERAN AT REST

Dr. B. M. Palmer, of New Orleans, Passes Away After Sixty Years of Service

FEW men carry with them to the grave, reverence and personal affection to so wide an extent as did the distinguished minister whom the whole South mourns to-day. Of late years, he came so seldom to the North that he had passed from the memory of many of this generation, but his name was a familiar one in all the churches, and was associated with respect for his great abilities and his saintly character. In the South, where he was so well known, he was sincerely loved and profoundly venerated.

Dr. Palmer came of New England ancestry. About the middle of the eighteenth century, Job Palmer, the son of a Massachusetts clergyman, went to Charleston, S. C., in company with William Tennent, the famous clergyman whose strange trance was the talk of the country near a hundred years ago. Those were troublous times, and Job Palmer was for a time a prisoner of war in the British hands. After his release he continued to reside in Charleston. He had two sons, Benjamin and Edward, both of whom were ministers of the Presbyterian Church. The latter had two sons, also ministers, the elder of whom, named after his distinguished uncle, the beloved pastor of the Circular Church in Charleston, has just been called to his reward. He was born in 1818, and from his earliest years, by his own predilection, as well as by family tradition, was drawn to the ministry. It was a strange coincidence that, during his college course at Amherst, his chief friend should have been Henry Ward Beecher. Little did the two young men then think that the time would come when each would be the most conspicuous religious leader of his respective section in the great struggle that rent the nation a score of years later.

Dr. Palmer's first charge was at Savannah, Ga., but after a brief ministry there the Seminary of Columbia offered him the chair of Church History, and pressed the matter so urgently that he accepted, on condition that his appointment be considered a temporary one. He was so deeply convinced that his mission was that of a preacher rather than a professor, that although his success in the latter capacity was conspicuous, and he was then and in later life pressed earnestly to devote himself exclusively to the work of teaching, he remained faithful to the pulpit as his sphere of labor. He continued, however, his service at Columbia until 1856, when he resigned to become pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of New Orleans. Five useful, prosperous years followed, and then came the call which emptied the church of every man capable of bearing arms. Dr. Palmer was heart and soul with the South in that dark hour. His sermons and the articles he wrote, were recognized as the most forceful and eloquent presentation of the Southern cause that were put forth. But at the end of the struggle he loyally accepted the situation, and pleaded as earnestly and powerfully for peace and harmony. From the end of the war to the close of his useful life, Dr. Palmer served the First Presbyterian Church with a devotion which won for him the intensest regard of his people. He was also a recognized leader in the Assembly, where he stood as an unyielding champion of conservatism and the soundest orthodoxy. His death, in his eighty-fourth year, is one of the most significant illustrations of ripe and effective work being done by an octogenarian.

THE EDITORIAL PREACHER

The Famous Preacher of the "New York Herald" Sermons Dies in Harness

ONE of the most startling surprises which the New York Herald gave the readers of its Sunday edition, about ten years ago, was the publication of a short sermon as its leading editorial. Dr. George H. Hepworth was the preacher. He was a member of the Herald staff, and, as he explained at the time, he preached the sermon at the request of the proprietor of the Herald, who had asked him whether it would not be possible to prepare a sermon so free from theological doctrine as to be acceptable to Protestant as well as Catholic, to Jew and Gentile. Dr. Hepworth undertook to prepare such a sermon, and with so much favor was it received that he was requested to continue the work, and he did so from that time until his death on June 7.

It was a strange adventure for a clergyman. The very issue of the paper on the Lord's Day was an offence to the great mass of Christian people. The readers were men of all faiths, and some of no faith. To the latter Dr. Hepworth found no difficulty in preaching, but to preach to men whose theological bias was strong and so bitterly opposed one to another, needed extraordinary tact and skill. So much at least may be said, that it was a good thing that men who preferred to stay at home and read a newspaper instead of going to church, should read matter of the kind that Dr. Hepworth wrote. It undoubtedly tended to elevate the character; it vigorously denounced wrongdoing, dishonesty, selfishness and inhumanity, and inculcated faith in God, kindness and benevolence. Probably the sermons would not have been read if Dr. Hepworth had gone further and preached the whole Gospel. It was something gained, in these days, if the lessons he did preach were taken to heart and put in practice.

Dr. Hepworth was in his seventieth year when he died. He was born in Boston, Mass., and was educated at Harvard. After a brief pastorate at Nantucket, he hired a theatre in Boston, and there, every Sunday afternoon and evening, he held services for non-churchgoers. The building was always crowded. The services were suspended during the war, while Dr. Hepworth served with the army on the staff of Gen. N. P. Banks. After peace was proclaimed he settled in New York as pastor of a Congregational church. His pastorate continued until in 1880, at the request of the New York Herald, he went to Ireland to superintend the distribution of relief to the sufferers of the famine. On his return he became pastor of a church at Newark, N. J., but his association with the Herald became more engrossing, and in 1885 he resigned to devote himself entirely to journalism. Besides writing regularly, he went on numerous expeditions in which special tact was required to ascertain exact facts in the face of contradictory reports. In work of this kind he went to the South and to Utah, and finally, at the time of the Armenian massacres, to Armenia. In all of these missions his reports showed a mind impartial and judicial, and a careful, painstaking effort to state the exact truth.

SWEET and flattering as was the tone of Mrs. Smalley's talk, Hilda felt that she was being patronized and treated as a country girl. Besides this, she could not keep her eyes from admiring glances at Mrs. Smalley's costume.

The latter graciously permitted this for an instant, then she arose with a grand rustle of concealed magnificence, which depressed poor Hilda more than what she saw. "I should be so pleased if you would drive with me a while this afternoon," she said, exuding, as it were, kindness with the odor of violets. "Have you any other engagement?"

"Let me see," said Hilda, wrinkling her pretty forehead affectedly, "Mr. Rossi and I are going to the opera this evening; but—no, I believe I have no other engagement for this afternoon."

"Then put on your hat at once, my love; we will have such a nice drive in the open air."

Under the brilliantly clear light of the easily. She felt instinctively that her husband would disapprove of the conversation; yet she longed to understand the situation from a different standpoint from her own. She was shrewd enough to guess that the excessive interest and affection shown by this comparative stranger must be unreal; but she, nevertheless, resolved to take advantage of it for the moment.

"You are just made for a full, generous, delightful life," pursued Mrs. Smalley gushingly. "You were never made for the country; no, indeed, my dear!"

Hilda blushed charmingly and displayed her eyelashes. "I don't like the country," she said simply.

"Then that is the very best of reasons why you should not stay there. But I started to tell you about the tenements; and I do feel that I am very bold indeed; I fear Mr. Rossi would never forgive me."

"I shall not tell him," said Hilda calmly.

"Oh, you naughty girl! don't you know young wives are supposed to tell their afternoon sky Hilda's fresh young loveliness impressed the older woman anew. It would really make quite a sensation, she told herself; and immediately began to consider this beauty in the light of a substantial round in the social ladder she was laboriously engaged in climbing.

Hilda would assuredly be courted by New York society if she came to the city. Her beauty and her husband's wealth would combine to that end. Could not it be so arranged that Hilda could be reached only through Mrs. Smalley? It would need a little tact, but if it could be done, Mrs. Smalley would receive invitations for Hilda's sake to houses now closed to her. These thoughts passed rapidly through the elder lady's mind, but they were put aside now to be considered later. The first thing to be done obviously was to array Hilda against the tenement improvements.

"The chief reason," she said, "why I regret Mr. Rossi taking up these schemes of his uncle's is the disaster it will lead to."

"What will it lead to?" said Hilda, full of vague alarms.

"In the first place, it will lead to a sadly narrow, restricted career for you. You will forgive me, if I take a very great liberty and tell you just what is in my heart, will you, dear?"

"Yes, certainly," murmured Hilda, un-husbands everything? Perhaps we learn better after a while; but that's the way we all have to begin. Well, as I was saying, my love, these tenements are going to eat up your husband's fortune in no time." She had not been saying anything of the sort, and she was wholly unprepared for the astonishing effect of these words upon Hilda.

The rosy face blanched; the violet eyes darkened with terror. "Eat up his fortune!" she echoed, in a low, strained voice, "what—what do you mean?"

"Why, it's perfectly plain, isn't it? though I'm not much of a business woman? If Mr. Rossi insists upon giving up his really paying investments and putting all his money in these absurd 'model tenements,' with every sort of expensive luxury and convenience for debased creatures who neither require nor understand such things—it can't be long before—"

"Is he—is he doing this?"

"Of course, he is; hasn't he told you? He doesn't intend to use his money for anything else; he has told Mr. Smalley so. And the property has been going down frightfully ever since he came into it. Of course, it will take a long time to really spend it all, for even these tenements are immensely valuable, but they don't bring in a tithe of the income that the old ones did. And the old ones are plenty good enough for the people who live in them. If you saw one this morning, you know that much yourself."

"I shouldn't like to live in one," said Hilda, with surprising candor.

"Certainly not; neither should I. But the people who do live in them are perfectly contented. They don't want anything better. There is no sense in comparing people of the lower classes with you and me; and that is just the mistake your good husband is making. He imagines himself in their place—as if he could be there! Their standards are entirely different from ours, and their surroundings are exactly what they choose and make for themselves."

The carriage was rolling swiftly through a smoothly paved avenue as they talked, and now its mistress seemed suddenly to awake to her surroundings. "Stop here for a moment, Smith," she said, addressing her coachman.

Then turning to Hilda: "Just look at this house, my dear Mrs. Rossi, and tell me if you like it. I think it is just what you want."

Hilda drew a quick breath of awe and longing. She mentally contrasted the ornate pile of granite with the humble little house on the back hill-road. "Wouldn't it cost a great deal of money to keep it up?" she asked, her husband's words about a thousand starving children recurring unpleasantly to her mind.

"Certainly not more than you can well afford," smiled Mrs. Smalley. "Have you the remotest idea of what your husband's income is, my love?"

"He told me how much he inherited from his grandfather," said Hilda, looking down, "but—"

Mrs. Smalley gazed at the fair flushed face with real pity. "Never mind, dear, we have talked business quite long enough," she said briskly, and turned the conversation into a sprightly monologue concerning New York society, to which Hilda listened in a tumult of pleasure and envy, not unmingled with fear.

She felt as she joined Immanuel at dinner an hour later, that she had been both deceived and misused. Her rights, as she termed them, had begun to assume certain definite proportions, as arrayed against a series of chimerical notions, from which it was her actual duty to set her husband free.

Chapter XXXII.

A Dose of Bitter Herbs

A WEEK later, young Mrs. Rossi again sat idly looking out of the window. The prospect which its clear panes commanded was a wide one, including a charming vista of blue hills and smiling stretches of valley, with the white spire of the church at Tacitus Four Corners piercing a cloudy group of trees. Nearer at hand the bright afternoon sunshine rested pleasantly on close-cut slopes of velvet turf, gay with flower-borders. Inside, a canary trilled overhead; a clear fire purled in the old fireplace; great bunches of golden-rod and autumn leaves lighted up the friendly faces of the books. It was, in short, a charmingly comfortable room, with a delightful outlook, yet the little mistress of it looked sadly unhappy; her slender figure was relaxed and nerveless, her red lips drooped dolefully, occasionally she wiped away a big tear which forced its way from under its long lashes.

"I just hate this place!" she said aloud, and flung her damp handkerchief at the joyous canary, with an irritable "I wish you'd keep still!"

A stooped figure advancing slowly down the road next attracted the frowning blue eyes. "Dear me, that's grandma; I wonder what she wants."

Grandma had only come to make an afternoon call. She carried in her aged bosom a feminine longing to "hear all about Hilda's visit to New York." "Why ain't you been to see us, Hilda?" she asked, with mild reproach in her kind eyes.

"Me an' Em'line was expectin' you most all the forenoon. Em'line, she's pretty near laid up with neuralgia in her knee. I sez to her, 'I guess I'll try an' git over to Hilda's this aft'noon,' I sez, 'an see if she's sick.' I thought mebbe you'd be all tuckered out with trav'lin' an' sight-seein', an' I guess you be, ain't you, dcary?"

"No, I'm not a bit tired," said Hilda, shortly. Then a childish temptation to air her grievances overcame her reticence. "I didn't want to come back."

"Didn't want to come back!" echoed the old lady. "Why, what on airth 'ud you be doin' way off there? Your home's here, child, an' home's the best place for a married woman."

"I could have a home there," said Hilda, tossing her small head. "I don't like the country one bit. It's too lonesome here; I just hate it!"

"Fur the land's sake!" cried her grandmother; "if you ain't the most ungrateful girl I ever see! To think of the way 'Manuel worked to fix this place up. An' it's jest as han'some as a pictur'—every room in it. I sh'd think you'd have more consideration fer your husband; he likes the country an' so you'd ought to."

"I like the city and he ought to!" retorted Hilda, with spirit. "I don't believe in giving in to a man all the while. If you begin that way, there's just no end to it. I haven't been used to living in such a lonesome place, and I just won't stay here this winter!"

Mrs. Scott's shrewd eyes dwelt for some moments on her granddaughter before she replied. "You ain't changed a mite sence you was little, Hilda," she said at last, with considerable acerbity of tone. "It was always, 'I won't do this because I don't like to; or I will do the other because I like to.' I'd ha' spanked that will an' won't out of you if I'd ha' had my way, an' it 'ud ha' been a blessin' to every body if I had. I used to tell your pa so time and again!"

Hilda tossed her yellow head with an arrogant curl of her red lips. "Papa knew better than to punish me," she cried, with a disagreeable little laugh. "I could always twist papa around my little finger!"

"Don't you go to tryin' to twist 'Manuel' round your finger, Hilda," said Mrs. Scott, earnestly. "There won't nothin' but misery come out of it. It's good Bible doctrine 'at the husband's the head of the wife; he'd ought to be, too!"

"Why, Grandma Scott, you know perfectly well that you've always had your way. Grandpa doesn't dare say his soul is his own unless he's out to the barn!" the blue eyes sparkled with malicious mischief, and the pink cheeks dimpled with a teasing smile.

"I've been 'bleeged to be firm 'bout some things," admitted Mrs. Scott with dignity. "But I've always treated your grandfather's opinions with respect."

"You've respectfully and firmly laid them to one side," laughed Hilda. "But I don't blame you; and you musn't blame me if I want to do the same thing. Immanuel's awfully rich, grandma, and there isn't a bit of sense in our living here if I don't want to."

"Awfully rich!" repeated Mrs. Scott; "who said so?"

"He told me so himself. But he's spending everything on a lot of horrid ungrateful creatures in New York, who don't care a bit about him. It's perfectly dreadful, and I mean to put a stop to it. It's my duty!"

"Where is 'Manuel'?" asked Mrs. Scott, surveying the flushed face before her with some anxiety. "I b'lieve a good hot dose of boneset tea 'ud do you good," she added reflectively.

"For heaven's sake don't mention it, grandma!" cried Hilda, with a gesture of loathing. "Of course you don't understand; I'm sure I didn't. Immanuel took me to the city on purpose to explain the matter. I suppose he thought I'd be perfectly delighted; but I know better. I'm not so stupid as he thinks."

THE CLIMBER

I HAVE climbed the Delectable Mountains,
In the sweet land of Beulah I rest;
Life's journey is now nearly ended,
I'm in sight of the home of the blest.

Like the prophet of old, from Mount Pisgah,
The fair land of Canaan I view,
Its green fields and clear flowing rivers,
Where the ransomed have joys ever new.

From the height of these beautiful mountains,
The City of God I behold;
All flashing with gems the most precious,
The streets brightly burnished with gold.

There Jesus now reigns in his splendor,
I long his great glory to see,
And oh! how my heart thrills with wonder,
When I think that my King died for me.

A Missionary's Prayer Answered

That man's extremity is God's opportunity is strikingly illustrated in the experience of missionary Elmer C. Hubbard, of the Cardenas Industrial Home in Cuba. In a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mr. Hubbard writes:

Your favor of May 13, with check contributed to our work by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has been received, and I heartily thank you and the contributors for it. God has richly blessed us lately in our work in Cardenas. We have taken the stand that we will appeal only to Him for help, and will not go in debt for anything. On the morning of Cuban Independence Day, we had only forty-two cents for the needs of our family of forty-two, and not enough food for the next day. That noon we received over twelve dollars from an Epworth League in the United States, and the contributors wrote that they felt it was in answer to prayer that they had been moved to send it to us. The next morning a deputation of Cuban gentlemen brought in a subscription of $160.46, which had been made up for us in Cardenas the day before. A few days later, the officers and employees of the Cardenas Railroad sent us $51 and 170 yards of cloth. We believe that God has troubled the hearts of the people of Cardenas to support the work that is being done for their destitute children.

HAMPERS BUSINESS.

Coffee Drinking Incapacitates Some People for Business at Times.

A gentleman from McBain, Michigan, says, "Coffee drinking has cost me much, for during my life I have been many times so thoroughly put out of condition that I have been compelled to abandon business for a day or two at a time. The attacks of headache would commence on the right side behind the ear and become so severe as to totally incapacitate me for any exercise, even mental. I have frequently had to take morphine to relieve the suffering. Sour stomach troubled me and I had a nervous heart that gave me a great deal of trouble.

Four years ago I saw an advertisement for Postum Food Coffee which recited the ill effects of coffee on the nerves. I at once decided to make the change and leave off coffee and take on Postum. The result has been all that one could expect.

I am never constipated any more, the bilious attacks never come on except from some indiscretion, such as drinking coffee, which I am foolish enough to indulge in now and then. I have no more headaches, no more sour stomach and no bilious spells. I have not been sick to my stomach or had a nervous vomiting spell in three years. Am now 56 years old, and have better health and do a better business and more comfortable than ever before in my life. I certainly attribute the change to leaving off coffee and using Postum for I have taken no medicine to aid in making the change.

The experiment as stated is absolutely true. I am willing, if necessary, to attach my affidavit to it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

THE FATHER'S CARE*

Life an Educational and Disciplinary Process for the Spiritual Development of the Christian

HOW much it helps a boy who has left his home for school or business life, to know that his father and mother still take an interest in his welfare! None are so likely to fall into sin and make shipwreck of their lives as those who, rightly or wrongly, are convinced that no one cares for them. It may be a poor home that the boy has left, and that no pecuniary help can come from it, or it may be that for some other reason, the boy knows he must depend on his own exertions for success; yet the unconsciousness of interest and sympathy helps him and encourages him in his loneliness. A mother tells the story of her two timid children that they could not bear to be left alone, but one day she left them at play on the first floor of her home, while she went to the second floor, to attend to some duty. The children continued their play contentedly, because when they called to her, she answered them. They knew they were within reach of her ear and they felt safe. They could not see her, but they knew her voice, and when "Yes, dears," was sufficient to satisfy them. They only needed the assurance of her being still near them, to keep them calm. All that the parent is to the child, God is to those who love him, and his children might have, if they would, the same comfort and confidence from that fact, that children have in the care of their earthly parents.

Men ask, when some great misfortune befalls them, "Does God care?" There are times when we are apt to think he does not. A scheme designed disinterestedly for the good of others, is thwarted; a really earnest strenuous effort on the part of a man to earn an honest living for his wife and family fails; a good man who has a child dependent upon him falls sick and dies, while men whose lives are a curse to themselves and all about them, live on and prosper. A hundred cases might be named that suggest the fear that the world is governed by caprice, or by one who is heedless of suffering. But against all these, the Bible puts the assurance of God's continual care and of his loving sympathy. There are mysteries in life, and it would be folly to deny the fact, but we are encouraged to wait for their solution and meanwhile to trust. God does pity his children; he cares for them and though he does not govern the world as we would do, we may be assured that he governs it wisely. We should tremble for my safety," a wise old good man once said, "if my own judgment approved of the providences of life. I should think that God was such an one to myself, and I know what a failure I could make of governing the world. But when I see things occur that I cannot understand, when I see mysteries that I cannot solve, I come to the conclusion that a power infinitely greater than my own is in control, and I feel safe." The child does not understand much that its father does, but would think that father more kind if he would let it have more play and would not be so insistent about school and study; but all the time the father is acting in the child's interest.

We know not what we shall be. Who can tell whether there is not some life ahead of us, for which all these trials and disappointments are preparing us? The child's hard study and his discipline are intended to prepare him for doing a man's part in the world; perhaps the man's hard toiling and his troubles are to prepare him for doing his duty in a life higher than this, which he will enter upon after death. So when we ask, "Does God care?" the answer may be that he cares in the best kind of way—the way in which a father cares for his child. We have a better knowledge of God's dealings with man than that Jesus gave us. He certainly knew more of God than any man teacher, and though he was evidently hampered in communicating that knowledge by the difficulty of revealing the divine to the human understanding, he uniformly presented the idea of God in the light of a father. The paternal relation appeared to him the most appropriate image of God's dealing with men. He uses it again and again in direct teaching and in his parables, notably in that of the Prodigal Son. What inference are we to draw from the fact? Is it not that our highest and best interests are God's concern, as the child's are those of his earthly father? The father's care, then, is not always the most pleasant and enjoyable for the child, but it is the best in the long run. It may be that God is so concerned about the development of character in his children, that he does not care whether they are rich or poor, obscure or conspicuous, whether they succeed in business or fail; but cares very much whether their faith and love are developed and whether they are like Christ, the pattern with which he provided us.

LOVE'S RECOMPENSE

AMID the turmoil and the strife
Of all we deem this mortal life,
Take time to send a loving thought
To one whose hours with pain are fraught,
Whose days are full of weariness,
And nights of lonely restlessness,
And it will soothe the weary breast
And to the restless heart bring rest,
And it will grow, and travel on
To bless some other weary one,
And in thine hour of deep distress
It will return to cheer and bless,
So beautiful and tender grown
Thou'lt scarce recall it as thine own;
But think an angel visitant
From out the gracious heavens sent
To bear a healing balm to thee,
Such is Love's helpful ministry.

Amid a life of happiness,
When every hour's a dream of bliss,
Take time to speak a loving word
Where loving words are seldom heard;
And it will linger in the mind,
And gather others of its kind,
Till loving words will echo where Erstwhile the heart was poor and bare;
And somewhere on thy heavenward track
Their music will come echoing back,
And flood thy soul with melody,
Such is Love's immortality.

'Mid daily cares so manifold
They seem more than one heart can hold,
Take time to lend a helping hand
Where loving deeds are nobly planned,
For those to whom such deeds are rare;
And it will ease thy load of care;
For Love doth every burden bear,
And when it rules the daily life
It lightens labor, stills all strife,
And sheds a radiance divine,
A very healing oil and wine,
Upon the fallen and the weak,
The bowed in spirit, and the meek;
And then returns an hundredfold
To bless the giver, with the gold
Of peace and joy and happiness,
Such is Love's wondrous bounteousness.

SUMMER FROLIC.

Get Ready Now.

Give the brain and body food during the summer that does not overtax the stomach and heat the body.

Grape-Nuts is a crisp, dainty and delicious food, selected parts of the grain treated by heat, moisture and time to slowly and perfectly develop the diastase from the grain and transform the starch into grape sugar in the most perfect manner; the small particles of phosphate of potash found in certain parts of the cereals are retained and these elements vitalize and nourish the body brain and nerve centers.

In its predigested form, it furnishes the necessary strength and energy in an easy way for the system to absorb without undue exertion and removes the general feeling of heaviness usual to hot weather.

Grape-Nuts and cream, a little fruit and possibly an egg or two cooked to suit the taste, is an ideal breakfast and will fully sustain the body until the noonday meal. Delicious desserts for luncheon and supper can be quickly made and have a flavor all their own from the peculiar, mild but satisfying sweet of the grape sugar.

Grape-Nuts will save the heat of cooking and the exertion of preparing food; will make you feel internally ten degrees cooler and fit you for the summer's heat, so that you may enjoy the full pleasures of the season.

Artistic Monuments

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored. Requires constant expense to keep it looking like new. Eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $400 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. Revision

LESSON XIII.

REVIEW.

1. Write the signs for the double consonants tr, gr, mp, wl, kw, rr, wh, whl. 2. In which two double consonants is the initial hook read first? 3. Write two words illustrating the vocalization of some of the other consonants. 4. What does when hooked represent?

The Aspirate

117. The aspirate is represented, in addition to the downward h and upward h, by a downward tick, thus, h (a contraction of the lower half of the sign h), and by a dot.

118. The downward stroke h is used when h stands ALONE, or is followed by — or —; thus, h high, h Hugh; h hawk, h hog; also when it gives a better outline than the upward stroke, as h hawser.

119. The upward stroke h is generally used when h is followed by a downstroke, a straight upstroke, the curves n and ng, or by a hook, circle, or loop; thus, h hop, h hobby, h haughty, h hid, h hatch, h hedge, h huffy, h heath, h heathen, h hush, h harrow, h here, h hurry, h honey, h hung, h huron, h hove, h host, h huckle.

120. When following another consonant, the stroke h must be so joined that the circle of the character cannot be read as the circle s; as, h cohere, h mohair, h Soho; h behave, h outhouse, h unholy.

121. The downward tick h is used initially, and is always read first. It is prefixed to the stroke consonants h (the fact that these are the four consonants in the word SMALLER forms a useful mnemonic) or to any of the double consonants to which it will easily join; thus, h hiss, h hazy, h ham, h hem, h hemp, h hall, h holly, h hear, h hearer, h Hebrew, h hydra, h hedger, h hither.

122. The dot h is placed before the vowel which is to be aspirated. It is used as an alternative to the stroke h, usually in order to avoid an awkward or long outline; thus, h happiness, h happening, h handy, h apprehend, h perhaps, h manhood, h loophole.

Exercise 38

had, happy.

Exercise 39

1. Hicks, hock, Hawkins, haggis, hackney, huckster. 2. hoop, hod, hitch, hoary, heap, heady, haddock. 3. hone, hive, housed, haggle, hammer, hairy, hardy. 4. Unhook, Sahara, cohesion; abhor, unhinge, unhitch. 5. hymn, hilly, horn, horror, haze, hump, hasty. 6. Gingham, happily, uphill, household, handy, Redhill. 7. In the isle which is his home, he says the herring fishery is among the occupations of the honest, homely people, and is far from unhealthy; on their behoof he hastens to say this to Hugo. 8. There is no hotel there, but you may stay at a coffee-house; I hear from Huxley the name of the owner is Hogg. 9. I shall be happy to hear you have had a pleasing holiday there.

REVIEW

1. Give the four signs used to represent the aspirate. 2. Explain when the stroke forms of h are employed. 3. What rule must be observed when h follows another consonant? 4. Show when the two other forms of h are used.

Upward and Downward L and R

123. The following rules govern the writing of the consonant l in either the upward or the downward direction, and the use of the upward or downward forms of r:

124. INITIAL L is generally written upward, thus, l loud, l aloud, l life, l alive. In the following cases it is written downward:

(a) When l is preceded by a vowel and is followed by a horizontal letter not hooked initially; as, l elk, l elm, l Ellen, l almoner.

The student is recommended to purchase the Key to the Shorthand Instructor, which forms a Key to all the Exercises appearing in these lessons, as well as to all the Review Questions. How God's People Learned His Character in the Desert

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

EVERY trial prepares us for blessing, and every blessing prepares us for further trial. Moses had to learn this fact when he led his people out of Egypt. In the wilderness of Sin the test was that of hunger. God had just wrought a miracle for the people in having sweetened the waters of Marah; he had done wonders for them in Egypt and at the Red Sea; but neither their sufferings nor their experiences of deliverance had changed them. They had no more confidence in God than when they were the slaves of Pharaoh. No circumstance can change the natural heart of man; only a new heart can produce a new life. The law can make nothing perfect (Heb. 7: 19).

The children of Israel murmured. This was the third time since they came out of Egypt (Exod. 14: 11; 15: 24). It was wrong, they thought, that they should be brought into the wilderness and have nothing to eat—somebody must be to blame; and, as they did not see God in the matter, they blamed Moses. O! how the ignoring of God leads to this murmuring against man! And how closely difficulties test us as to whether we really believe in an unseen God. The people said unto Moses and Aaron, "Would God that we had died by the hand of the Lord in Egypt, when we sat by the fleshpots, and when we ate bread to the full" (Exod. 16: 3). O how little they knew what they said! How many miserable suicides seek to escape some suffering here by plunging into an awful, unknown future without God! They take themselves out of reach of present mercy, and daringly provoke certain future judgment!

Moses understood God's purpose, and he could write later on, "He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by everything that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live" (Deut. 8: 3). Moses was not alarmed at the prospect of the people dying of hunger. How could they die of hunger if God fulfilled his promise to give them the land of Canaan? And Moses stood the test of the unbelieving impatience and ungrateful accusations of the people, and spoke no word in self-defense. He knew more of God than was contained in the law. And God was true, as he expected, and said, "Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you who have asked me (Moses and Aaron) . . . that I may prove them whether they will walk in my law or no." He proved them by suffering them to hunger, and they failed under the test; now he would prove them by supplying their need. Moses knew, and a man of faith always knows, that the extremity of man is just the opportunity for God to manifest his power and glory, and that therefore every test of faith and patience is a privilege given by God.

God having spoken to Moses, he must convey the message to the people. He and Aaron said to them, "At even, then ye shall know that the Lord hath brought you out of Egypt; and in the morning ye shall see the glory of the Lord; for that he heareth your murmurings against the Lord." How does God hear things? Just as they really are. Deep down in the hearts of the people there was a murmur against God, and he heard their words in this light—they could not hide it from him. "The Lord heareth your murmurings which ye murmur against him; and what are we? Your murmurings are not against us, but against the Lord" (Exod. 16: 6-8). Moses once said, "Who am I?" in unbelief (Exod. 3: 11; 4: 1, 10-13); now he says, "Who are we?" in self-emptiness. The people must come into God's presence about this matter; they were commanded, "Come near before the Lord; for that he hath heard your murmurings," and the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud, and God told Moses, "I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel; speak to them, saying, At even ye shall eat flesh, and in the morning ye shall be filled with bread; and ye shall know that I am the Lord your God."

Miscellaneous Questions

L. E. S., Schenectady, N. Y. Why was it necessary for Moses to put a brazen serpent on a pole (Numbers 21:8), in order to cure the bitten Israelites, and why is the act so often used as a symbol of Christ?

It was Christ's own use of the symbol that justifies it (see John 3:14). It was a test of faith and obedience, similar to that required of Naaman (11. Kings 5:10). There was nothing in the waters of Jordan that could cure leprosy, nor in the serpent that could cure snake-bite, but the question was whether the sufferer would avail himself of the remedy provided. The idea of Christ's vicarious suffering has seemed foolish as a remedy for sin to the philosophers of our own and earlier times, but we know by experience that it is effectual. People by the million have found by experience that in looking to Christ for help, as the snake-bitten Israelite looked to the brazen serpent, they have been saved.

Lucien S., Goshen, Ky. Since most modern wars are waged for commercial, rather than moral reasons, would it be immoral for great nations like England and America to attain their ends, if possible, by the liberal offer of money to an opponent? Take the Boer and Philippine wars, for example.

The proposition to settle all international difficulties by the use of money, if adopted, would open the way to a reign of venality and corruption such as the world never heard of. The true idea would be to adjust all such differences by an international court of arbitration.

Student, New Haven, Conn. Why does the Lord's Prayer teach us to pray, "Lead us not into temptation?" Does God ever so lead men?

Dean Alford's translation is better. It runs "Abandon us not in temptation." There are providential circumstances which we believe to be always under the control and direction of God, which involve temptation. For example: if in the providence of God, a man loses all his property and becomes poor, there is presented to him the temptation to get money by wrong means. We infer that the petition is for protection in the temptations inevitable to men, and especially that none might assail them that were stronger than they could resist.

Elmer E. P., Eaton, O. Should a man be punished for crimes and deeds done while under the influence of liquor?

Certainly he should be punished, and he usually is punished, as drunkenness is not accepted as an excuse, in cases of violation of law.

Subscriber, Kansas City, Mo. If it was God who hardened Pharaoh's heart, as is stated in Exodus 9:12, and other places, was it just to punish him for it?

There can be no doubt of the justice of his punishment. He was responsible for his treatment of the Israelites. The common form of Hebrew thought gives rise to your doubt.

seeks to apprehend God and to realize his responsibility to God.

A. V. T., Asheville, N. C. 1. When and where did the term "smith" originate as applied to the mechanic arts, as in goldsmith, silversmith, tin-smith, blacksmith, locksmith, etc., and what is its signification as so used? 2. Also the term "wright," as in shipwright, millwright, etc.?

1. It is derived from the Anglo-Saxon words "smitan" (a stroke) and "smithian," one who strikes, shapes, fashions, or hammers. This gradually came to be applied to all trades in which the hammer or its equivalent is used. 2. The Anglo-Saxon derivative is "wyrhta" from "wyrkan" (work); thus a wright means simply a mechanical worker with tools.

W. F. P., Elizabeth, Ill. 1. Is inability to sing, a disqualification to a young man for the work of the active ministry? 2. If the vocal organs are in a healthy condition, can a person be taught to sing?

1. No. While it may possibly be an advantage for a young minister to possess musical taste and the ability to "carry a tune," it is very far from being essential. Few of the production of gross impurities into the Christian worship. It is believed, specially, that they tried to bring into the Christian feasts the most reprehensible features of the orgies which characterized the heathen feasts. They also perverted the pure doctrine, and put upon it such interpretations as gave sanction to immoralities.

S. B. G., Hare's Valley, Pa. Was maize or Indian corn grown by the ancients of the Old World, before the discovery of America?

Meyer and many other authorities have asserted that maize was unknown before the discovery of America, but M. Bonafous (Italian) has pointed out that maize figured in a Chinese botanical work in the sixteenth century. Besides, in 1819 M. Rifaud discovered grains and leaves of Indian corn under the head of an Egyptian mummy at Thebes. It may have been known widely over the ancient Eastern world.

H. D. H., Troy, N. Y. Can any of your readers explain the difference between fashionable card-playing for a prize worth from $1 to $10, and going to any place and playing from $100 to $10,000 or more? I am unable to distinguish the difference.

The difference is in name alone. One may be called "a parlor euchre party," but it is gambling, just as much as the other, though without some of the more vulgar accompaniments.

L. A. Palmyra, N. Y. I have heard it stated that Christ's birth took place several years before the year 1 of our era. How is that known?

The calculation is made through the discovery of the date of the death of Herod, who ordered the massacre of the children soon after the birth of Jesus. It is known that he died on some day between March 13 and April 4 of the year which in the Roman calendar was 750. The year 1 of our era corresponded to the year 754. It is obvious, therefore, that Jesus must have been at least four years old in that year. Another basis of calculation is the registry or enrollment which caused Joseph and Mary to go to Bethlehem. This is not absolutely certain, but the general consensus of opinion deduced from these two events, and others, is that Jesus was born near the close of the year 749, which would be B. C. 5.

Reader, Phoenixville, Pa. We should not set ourselves up as judges of individuals. God is able to save "to the uttermost," advanced age and previous condition of heart forming no barriers. The repentance may be sincere and the effort at restitution genuine.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOK DEPARTMENT
BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK CITY

The Hebrew writers attributed every providential occurrence to God, as you must have noticed in Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, etc. If a modern historian had been writing those histories he would have shown how the national policy led to the hostility of other nations and the final extinction of the Hebrew kingdoms. The Hebrew writers see only one cause: the kings and the people offended God. That was sufficient reason with them to account for the calamity. So in writing of Pharaoh, they say God hardened his heart. They saw God in everything; we go to the opposite extreme and assign a natural cause for everything. Perhaps the meaning of the writer of Exodus would have been more clearly expressed if he had said that the mercy of God in removing the plagues had the effect of hardening his heart. That was not its purpose but its effect, as the forbearance of a loving parent frequently leads a boy to continue wrongdoing, in the belief that at any time he can get his father's forgiveness.

Reader, Scranton, Pa. In what sense is man, body, soul and spirit? Do not soul and spirit mean the same thing?

The terms are adopted as a convenience of expression to avoid metaphysical explanation. Roughly stated, the soul stands for the faculties we have in common with the lower animals, intelligent life, perception, disposition, etc., while we apply the word spirit to the higher faculties peculiar to man, by which he great leaders in the ministry were musical, and some were totally untrained and unable to sing a note. Such a defect need not interfere with a man's spirituality nor hinder his success in the ministry. 2. The love of music is a quality of the brain rather than of the vocal organs. The only way to determine the matter is to put it to a practical test, by consulting a teacher of the voice.

Mrs. M. F. W., Hempstead, N. Y. What is the greatest blessing that we can have in this world?

We presume material blessing is meant. Opinions may differ very materially as to the answer. Some might prefer health, or wealth, or influence, or fame; others might say "a contented mind." The sinner or criminal would unquestionably say "a clear conscience." Probably no two among fifty persons would give the same answer.

G. W. H., Arizona. 1. Can a man be a Christian and practice hypnotism? 2. What are the deeds of the Nicolaitans referred to in Rev. 2:6 and 15?

1. Up to the present time, hypnotism has not been accepted as a science, and as it is largely practiced by impostors and charlatans, our advice is to let it severely alone. 2. There is a wide difference of opinion among commentators concerning the Nicolaitans, but the latest writers on the subject hold that the sin of the sect consisted in making the new-found "liberty" of the Christian religion a cloak for cowardice and licentiousness, and for the in-

THE GROUP OF MISSIONARIES TO THE FOREIGN FIELD, NEWLY APPOINTED BY THE PRESBYTERIAN BOARD

A Grand Phalanx of New Missionaries

SELDOM has a more inspiring scene been witnessed at any religious gathering in New York, than that which took place recently at the Fifth Annual Conference of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, when fifty-seven young missionaries were commissioned to go to the foreign field. This is said to be the largest band of workers ever sent out by any missionary board from New York City. The Conference began its sessions at No. 156 Fifth avenue, on June 11, closing on June 18. Throughout all the sessions, the absorbing theme of discussion was the missionary's field and his work. Addresses were made by such distinguished speakers as Revs. G. B. Matthews, Arthur Brown, E. F. Ellinwood, Huie Kin, E. B. Cobb, E. N. White, H. G. Underwood, David Gregg, W. T. Elsing, Arlan P. Beach, A. W. Halsey, George Alexander; so by Miss H. W. Hubbard, Mrs. Margaret Sangster, Mrs. A. F. Schauffler, Dr. Pauline Root, Mr. Robert E. peer, Charles W. Hand, W. H. Grant and others. The address embraced many phases of missionary work, among the announced topics being "The Missionary as a Builder," "Preaching to the Heathen," "Paul's Mission Methods," "Missionary Letters," "The Live Missionary Church," "The Relation of the Missionary to the Natives," "Good Books for Missionaries," "Call, Qualification and Preparation of Missionaries," "The Missionary and his Bible," etc.

Grouped together and attentively listening to the messages from the veteran workers, were the new missionary candidates under appointment. They were a bright-looking band of very earnest and zealous young men and women. Bound for the remotest parts of the globe, they had come to take their farewells of missionary friends and to receive the last parting words of counsel. The new missionaries and their destinations are as follows:

Africa—Rev. Campbell L. Mackay and Miss Jean C. Dodd, Rev. Henry White and Miss Charlotte Dickson, Hymen Lawrence Weber, M.D., and Miss Ethelbert B. Kolb, Miss Myrtle Elizabeth Kirby.

Canton, China—Rev. Edward M. Scheirer, Rev. Alzo. John Fisher.

Central China—Rev. Harrison King Wright and Mrs. Mary How Miller Wright, Miss Rose Hoffman.

Siam—Rev. R. W. Post and Miss Mame Stebbins.

Unassigned—Miss Anna K. M. Franz, Rev. Alexander Bertman Allison and Miss Amy Janet Boggs.

During the week of the Conference, many of the newly-appointed missionaries spoke by request in churches in different parts of New York and Brooklyn. The photograph of the new missionaries, which appears on this page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was taken by special arrangement, and is a most excellent presentation of this brave band of consecrated men and women, who, leaving all behind, are now setting out to carry the Gospel light unto the dark places of earth, and to win souls to Christ.

AMERICA'S MISSION

TEXT, Matt. 13: 38—"The field is the world"

EVERY republic has a Fourth of July. It has an annual holiday, set apart for living over again the scenes of its struggle for independence. It has a birthday celebration for banquets, fireworks, oratorical pyrotechnics, and for the arousal of patriotic enthusiasms.

The French Republic's Fourth of July is celebrated on the 14th day of July. This is the anniversary when the grim fortress of a prison for State criminals was razed to the ground. The Bastille was to the French what the Tower of London was to the British. It represented to all the common people the tyrannies of a despotic throne. It represented to them the place where men and women, to please a royal whim, might be lodged for a little while on their way to quench with their life's blood the insatiable thirst of the headsman's axe. So, on the 14th day of July, every car and wagon is stopped in the Parisian capital. Then the young men and maidens, decked in holiday attire, turn the broad boulevard of the Champs Elysees into a ball-room. Then in the French cities can be heard the songs of the merrymakers, and the music from the different bands, playing up and down almost every street. The Brazilian Republic's Fourth of July is celebrated on the 16th day of November, the anniversary of the time when Dom Pedro's empire was overthrown, and the exiled imperial family had to sail away from the waters of the Amazon. One of the first acts of the Cuban Congress, which assembled after the American soldiers had been withdrawn, was to appoint a national holiday to commemorate the day on which the Cuban Republic had gained her independence. So the people of the United States Government should hold sacred the day on which Jefferson and Adams and Franklin and Sherman and John Hancock and Samuel Adams signed the memorable document which made the Goddess of Liberty a full-grown queen.

A Glorious Future

But there is an unwise as well as a wise way of celebrating the modern Fourth of July. The first way is to glorify the past, as though our forefathers had won all the American victories that can ever be won. The other way is to take a national retrospect, for the purpose of rousing our ambitions to go ahead and win the further victories that must be won in order to fulfil America's mission. And if any minister tries the latter way, he cannot take in the full sweep of America's future influence and work, unless he discusses them from a world-wide standpoint. He must attune his Fourth of July sermon to a world's theme, as Phillips Brooks, the most beloved man of New England in his day, keyed his ministry to an international tone, when, from a European city, he sent to a friend at home a letter which read something like this: "Dear Harry—I wish you might do as I do every year. I wish you would annually spend two months abroad in travel. Such a vacation teaches you the immensity of God's providences, and how small are the circumscriptions of our own individual lives, and how small even the Episcopal Church appears to be when it is focused from across the seas." So the purpose of this Fourth of July sermon is to try to discuss the world-wide influence of America's future mission, rather than to spend our time eulogizing what has been done at Bunker Hill, Saratoga, Brandywine, Valley Forge, and Yorktown. The field of America's future usefulness is not to be limited by the Atlantic on the one side and the Golden Gate of the Pacific on the other side. It is to be as wide as the five continents, as ample as the two hemispheres. It is to take in all the mainlands, as well as the isles of the seas.

Emphatically, the most important of all America's future missions is the spreading of the Gospel, until it shall "be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations." The Bible does not state that the millennial day shall come gradually, as the sunrise first tips the eastern hills with light, making it appear as though the underbrush upon the tops of the mountains had been set afire by some careless campers. It does not state that the millennial day shall come as when the dawn in the beginning shoots its long, slender bars of yellow gold across the heavens. It does not state that the glory of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea, as the flood tide gradually creeps up the beach. But the Bible does teach that, when the Gospel of Jesus Christ shall be proclaimed in every town, village and city of every nation; when it shall be proclaimed in the mountain log hut and in the ship's cabin, when it shall be proclaimed under the shadow of every legislative hall and by the camp-fire of every heathen tribe; when it shall "be proclaimed in all the world for a witness unto all nations, then shall the end come."

Then the millennial day shall be flooded with light, even as a darkened hall is instantly illuminated when the many different electric lights flash out at the touch of a single button. Then the millennial day shall be full of brilliancy, as the blackness of midnight was changed into the brightness of midnoon when God spake at the morning of creation, the four simple words: "Let there be light, and there was light." The millennial day shall come as suddenly as the tongues of fire leaped out of the heavens when the Holy Spirit hovered over the heads of the praying, pleading, exultant Pentecostal worshippers.

An Evangelizing People

If the millennial day is to come when the Gospel shall be proclaimed unto all the nations of the earth, I ask you this pertinent question: what nation is better fitted to convey that Gospel to all unevangelized nations than the American nation? Was not this nation, in the first place, founded in the name of God? Did not old John Robinson stand upon the shore, just before the Mayflower sailed, and dedicate to God the little band of Pilgrim fathers? Was not that Pilgrim band bound together by sacred covenant, to walk in all his ways, made known, or to be made known unto them, according to their best endeavors, whatever it should cost? Was not Maryland settled in the name of God? And Georgia in the name of God? And Pennsylvania in the name of God? On account of this past dedication of our forefathers, dare America refuse to carry the Gospel unto all nations of the earth?

This nation is especially fitted to carry the Gospel unto all people, because here we have no established church; every religious denomination can free-handedly do its full stint of work. England has an established church. The Episcopalian church is there joined with the State. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the other Episcopalian bishops sit in the House of Lords, and help make the nation's laws. The Presbyterian Church is the established church of Scotland. The Lutheran Church is the established church of Germany. The Greek Church is the established church of Russia. The Catholic Church is the established church of Spain, Portugal, France, Italy and Austria. But in America, the Methodist, the Episcopalian, the Baptist, the Lutheran, the Presbyterian, the Friends, the Catholic Churches all stand upon an equal footing. Here they can work, side by side, for the scattering of the Gospel among all nations.

How the different religious denominations are able to work side by side in America for the scattering of the Gospel seed may be illustrated by an incident in the life of George Whitefield. One day the great evangelist stopped dramatically in his sermon, and, looking up as though addressing the throne of the Almighty, cried out in interrogation: "Oh, Lord, are there any Presbyterians in heaven?" "No," came back the answer. "Oh, Lord, are there any Episcopalians in heaven?" "No," again came the answer. "Oh, Lord, are there any Methodists in heaven?" "No." "Who, then, are the denizens of the skies?" "Christians one, Christians all." So, in the scattering of the Gospel seed by the American nation, there are no religious sects. In the sight of the government there are only Christians. The Calvinists and the Arminians, the close communicants and the Congregationalists, the Protestants and the Catholics can work side by side, because these different religious denominations believe in the Atonement. They can and should scatter the Gospel seed unto all nations, because the American nation was settled and consecrated by our forefathers to the service of the Lord Jesus Christ.

A Mission of Peace

America's second mission is emphatically the establishment of an international court of arbitration, so that bloody wars in the future shall be an impossibility. That a great international court of arbitration can be established by the united action of the ten or twelve principal nations of the world is undeniable, and that such a court will be ultimately established is also unquestioned. When such a court is established, the United States, England, France, Spain, Austria, Germany, Italy, Russia, Japan and China will each have representatives upon that tribunal. Then, when international difficulties arise, these difficulties will be peacefully settled, as the Alabama claims were amicably settled before the Geneva tribunal which assembled in 1871, composed of the five representatives, which were furnished by the United States, Great Britain, Italy, Switzerland and Brazil; as the Venezuela claims were settled before a tribunal which met in Paris in 1900; as the Alaska boundary line was amicably settled, and as the war claims against the Chinese government by the different allied forces are now being amicably settled.

Now, my friends, what civilized nation on the face of the globe is better fitted to lead in the establishment of this supreme court of international arbitration than the American nation? The different nations of Europe,—I care not how strong some of them may be—are unable to successfully lead in this movement for universal peace, because those nations are jealous of each other. Those different European nations cannot do as they would, no matter how noble and Christian their motives might be. If they could do as they wished, they long ago would have wiped off the face of the earth that most cruel and corrupt of all governments, the government of Turkey. When the Sultan gave orders to his soldiers to massacre in cold blood the Armenians, a great wave of horror rolled over all civilized lands. Though William E. Gladstone was then a dying old man, he took up his pen and wrote a God-like protest. Indignation, voicing the sentiment of every civilized government, was heard alike in London, Paris, Berlin, Rome, Vienna, St. Petersburg, and New York. But though men and women were slaughtered by the hundreds and the thousands; though in midwinter young girls and boys were stripped of their garments, and driven forth naked into the mountains to freeze and to starve and to die; though whole families were destroyed, and whole regions desolated, yet not one nation of Europe was able to prevent or avenge the massacres, because the European nations were jealous of each other. The nation that would attempt to obliterate the Turkish government would have the swords of other European nations plunging at its heart. But the American nation, being removed three thousand miles from the European nations, is hand-free, foot-free, and heart-free. It can lead in this movement to establish a supreme court of arbitration, because all foreign nations will realize that it is not making such a move to upset the "balance of European power" or to absorb new territory. And a Christian nation like the American, which does not try to turn the sword into the plowshare and the spear into the pruning hook, deserves to lose its influence, to fall from its proud position as a great and free nation and to perish from the earth.

A Compelling Emblem

Recognizing the fact that many people are looking forward to the time when war shall forever be abolished, an imaginative writer once described how that blessed condition was to be accomplished. He declared that the time would come when all Europe would be convulsed by a great international struggle. He pictured that event in the dim future. He arrayed every European nation upon one or the other side of the combat. But the night before the great battle was to open, an angel in human shape would be seen going through the camps of the two armies. This visitor would stop long enough to pin upon every soldier's breast a sign. And when the two vast armies would next day prepare for battle and the command would be given to the troops to fire, not a rifle would flash, not a sword would be unsheathed, not a cannon would speak; because the sign pinned upon every soldier's heart would be the sign of the cross. The picture drawn by that imaginative writer may be accepted as a truthful one, except in two or three facts. He describes that day as in the dim future; I believe the day is now almost at hand. Again, that writer describes the peacemaker who will attach the emblem of the cross to the breast of the common soldiers, as a man; I believe that peacemaker will not be a man, but a nation, and that peacemaking nation the American nation. America shall pin a sign of universal peace upon every European nation by the means of a supreme court of international arbitration. This sign shall decree that war, bloody, fiendish, demoniacal war, shall be no longer; that war shall forever be as dead as the multitudes of dead soldiers, whose bodies are now decomposing in the grave trenches all round the world.

America's future world-wide mission will also be found in her emphatic protest that might is not always right. Until the Supreme court of international arbitration shall be established, there will be many international injustices. From time immemorial, the strong nations have been trampling upon and browbeating the weak nations. Heretofore, the American nation has been unable to do much more than look after its own personal interests. But now that time is past. The American nation—and when I speak about the American nation, I naturally mean the United States Government—has grown to be so strong that, by the power of its great navy and its great multitude of inhabitants, it can successfully and in a Christian spirit take up the causes of the weaker and the more helpless nations, when those nations are being downtrodden and unjustly used by the greater governmental powers. The American nation can do for the helpless and weaker nations what it did for suffering and helpless Cuba. When the Spanish Governor-General of Cuba, General Weyler, began to murder and to imprison and to exterminate and to rob the Cubans, he did not for one instant suppose that, in order to protect and save a neighboring people, the Congress of the United States would declare war against Spain, and at one sitting vote $50,000,000 to the President of the United States to carry on that war. But the United States Government did throw its protecting arm about that suffering people. The United States Government did offer that protection in an unselfish manner. As soon as the Cuban Islands were rescued from Spanish tyranny, the United States raised Cuba to the dignity of a sister republic. When the United States Government declared war against Spain, the Spanish Government did not for one instant suppose that the Philippine Islands would be snatched from Spanish control; but they were. No sooner did the guns of Admiral Dewey echo round the world than the people of America realized that there were other lands suffering from the tyranny of Spain, as well as the Cuban Islands. So the Stars and Stripes were hoisted over the Philippine islands as well as in Havana Harbor. And when those stars and stripes were raised in the East as well as in the West, the United States Government declared that its protecting arm should care for the downtrodden races of the Pacific, as well as those of the Atlantic. And so one of the mightiest and the purest and the holiest motives of America's future mission will be to care for helpless and unjustly treated nations wherever they may be found, until a supreme court of international arbitration can be established. Then those weaker and downtrodden nations shall be able to care for themselves.

But perhaps the greatest mission of America, next to scattering the Gospel of Jesus Christ, is to prove that its people can be true to God in its days of prosperity, as well as in its days of adversity. When a people are poor, weak and helpless; when a troubled and bleeding and suffering people are struggling for liberty and for their very existence; when a collection of ex-slaves are following their leader through the weary journey of a forty-year tramp through the wilderness, it is not so difficult for them to pray and to worship God, but it is difficult for a people to be true to God, unless when riches come and prosperity comes, and unlimited influence comes, they have an especial grace given to them. It is difficult to be true to God when the mighty fortresses have been built at the mouth of every harbor to keep out the foreign foe, and when the rattle of the factory, and the whistle of the steam engine, and the blow of the hammer, and the rasp of the saw are all playing an accompaniment to the tune of a national financial success. It is difficult for a people to pray to a Supernatural Being: "O God, give us this day our daily bread," when the granaries are full of wheat and corn, and the bank vaults are a-choke with solid gold, and the seven years of plenty have crowded out of the public mind the fact that there ever could come seven years of abject and unrelieved want. And since the most prosperous days which have yet come to a people are now crowding upon our nation, the American people will have to pray harder than the Pilgrims ever prayed at the Plymouth Rock, or the Pennsylvanian colonists ever prayed about William Penn, or the Virginia planters ever prayed at Jamestown to preserve as a nation our Christian integrity. Oh, Lord God of John Robinson, Richard Carver and William Bradford, Richard and Increase and Cotton Mather, and John Adams and Patrick Henry, and George Washington and William Penn, and the first colonists of Maryland and Georgia, bless and keep and hold the American people to thee amid these twentieth century prosperities, as Thou didst guide and protect them during the dark days of the seventeenth and eighteenth and nineteenth centuries already past!

As the American nation is a government for the people and by the people, I would have every one of us, this Fourth of July season, reconsecrate our nation to God by reconsecrating our own personal lives to his divine service. When the Ambassador from Germany appears at the White House, and presents his official documents, he does not come as the representative of the German nation, but as the personal representative of Emperor William. The Ambassador of England, represents King Edward. The representative of Italy, represents King Victor Emmanuel. But when America's Ambassador goes abroad, he does not represent the President or the Secretary of State, but he represents the people—the common people of America. And as part of the common people of America, we can here and now begin to reconsecrate our government to the Lord, in its days of prosperity, by reconsecrating ourselves. Oh Lord, our God, can any one have a greater work to do in the evangelization of the world than we Americans, if we consecrate our lives to thy service?

I selected this text "The field is the world," for two reasons: First, because the five words spoken by Jesus Christ to his disciples exactly convey the idea of the world-wide sweep of America's influence in the evangelization of the two hemispheres. As Cain was his brother's keeper, so is every Christian nation morally responsible for the education, the evangelization and the protection of every other nation! But the second reason why I selected this text, is because it always has had an intense personal interest to me. This was the first text, which my father as a theological student ever preached upon. When my father was a young man at New Brunswick Seminary, he went to visit my uncle, who was then a pastor at Easthampton, Long Island. He went to visit in the same old parsonage where the great Lyman Beecher, the father of Henry Ward Beecher used to live, and where many of the famous brothers and sisters of Henry Ward Beecher were born. And while my father was visiting his brother-in-law, the Rev. Stephen Mershon, the village minister, asked him to preach. So he preached in the schoolhouse there, in the village of Easthampton his first sermon. The schoolhouse is now used as a barber shop. It is not larger than the ordinary-sized parlor of an average city house. In that little schoolhouse, the unknown theological student took for his text "The field is the world." He little realized then that there ever would come a time when his Gospel field would literally be the world. He little realized that, before he died, his printed sermons every week would appear before at least twenty millions of readers. He little realized how God would some day bless his pen and lip. He could not foresee his future world-wide power, any more than some of us can foresee the world-wide influence that will result from our lives, if we will only help in the days of national prosperity to dedicate the American nation to the service of God.

So may the Fourth of July ever be to all Americans a sacred day. May it be a time when, by retrospection, we learn what pure and noble and consecrated ancestral blood is flowing in our veins. May it be a time when the American people bow their heads to make an earnest, intense plea that the present generation shall be as true to their gospel trust as our forefathers were true to theirs. Then, after we have knelt in prayer, may we go forth inspired by the Holy Spirit to do the work which has been given us to do. Then the brightest pages of American history will be written at the millennial dawn when the United States future mission, by the grace of God, shall be gloriously finished.

✻ GOSPEL WORK IN BRAZIL ✻

✻ A MISSION WHOSE CONVERTS ARE ALREADY BECOMING EVANGELISTS ✻

An exceedingly interesting story of successful mission work is told by Mr. Reginald J. Young, who has just returned from Brazil. He has been laboring for six years past in that populous land, and is now in this country seeking help to extend his work. His experience in the cities and country districts of Brazil has convinced him that if a systematic and earnest effort were made to evangelize the country, a rich harvest of souls might be reaped. It is, he says, a most promising mission field, which would well repay the labors of consecrated Gospel workers.

Mr. Young and his wife were gradually led into mission work in Brazil by a brief stay in Rio Janeiro. They had a small property sufficient for their own needs, and during their visit they made excursions from the city into the interior. They were astonished to find how few of the acquaintances they made knew anything of the Gospel or of the word of God. Even educated people there were, who did not possess a copy of the Bible. Mr. and Mrs. Young obtained from the Bible Society a consignment of Bibles, Testaments and single Gospels in Portuguese. These were soon in circulation, many being readily sold and others given away to people anxious to get them. The Christian visitors procured a fresh stock and went on a long journey westward, calling at the towns on the way and selling or giving away the precious volumes. Returning, they settled at Sao Paulo, near Santos, where they hired a room for public meetings. Here the Bible was read and explained. Many came, and soon there were people inquiring the way to be saved. A canvass from house to house was made of the city of Santos, and a large number of portions of the Bible were sold. The city of Sao Paulo, which has 250,000 population, was also canvassed as far as possible, and the people invited to the meetings. Visits were also made to the neighboring towns. At one of these a young Englishman named F. C. Glass was brought to Christ, and so earnest was he that he abandoned his business to assist in the mission work. He has proved a very successful worker.

About forty persons in all have made profession of faith at Sao Paulo, and there are many others who have been greatly blessed. At one of the meetings, it so impressed a Roman Catholic priest that he became an inquirer, and has since accepted Christ. Sur Mello has, with two other workers, set out on foot on a mission journey through three States, intending to preach in all their chief towns. One of Snr Mello's companions is Snr Egydio Dias, who also was converted at the Sao Paulo Mission. He is a Spaniard, but speaks Portuguese fluently. For about a year after his conversion, he made his home with Mr. and Mrs. Young, and they had therefore abundant opportunities of observing his character. Although he had been a man of utterly irreligious life, his quiet, humble, earnest behavior made a deep impression on all who came in contact with him.

Mr. Young's chief desire is to organize a corps of native workers. He is convinced that in Brazil the church will grow better if it is not regarded as a missionary church. Native Brazilians have a better command of the language than a foreigner can ever acquire; they are more familiar with national customs and modes of thought, and they do not encounter the prejudice with which the native is apt to regard the foreigner who comes to teach him religion. He therefore relies chiefly for future success on the converts whom he is training, but most of all on the circulation of the Bible, which, to many Brazilian households, is a new book.

TO SAVE THE OLD FLAG HOUSE

Patriotic Movement to Acquire the Betsy Ross House as a National Museum

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS
Sec'y, Flag House Committee

THE "Old Flag House," a name that appeals to Americans everywhere, is fast becoming, through the efforts of our loyal citizens, a national shrine. The work of purchasing and preserving this historic house has been undertaken by the people generally, and as many of our readers are doubtless interested in the project, a few authoritative facts concerning the "Old Flag House," may not be out of place. When William Penn, with Christian grace and moral fortitude, had completed his unique treaty with the hostile Indians, he began the erection of a mansion in the city that was to become in the near future the scene of revolutionary strife. He imported sufficient brick to build the house that was destined to become known far and wide as the "Flag House." The good ship Welcome brought from England the brick and other material employed in the construction of the house, which now stands on Arch street, Philadelphia. It is two stories high, with colonial windows, dormers and roof, and is exceedingly plain in architectural design. The dimensions of the house are 17 x 76, and to many the figures may have seemed prophetic. During three centuries, the mansion with its quaint balcony, its porte-cochere, its delightful and well-kept garden, have seen many innovations. It has been at one time a humble dwelling; again, a shop, and again a dwelling. In 1776 it was occupied as an upholstery shop by John Ross, a young man of patriotic spirit, who sprang to arms at the call of the colonists, and gave up his life as an early martyr to the cause of liberty. Within this humble abode, his young widow, Betsy Ross, in the presence of General Washington, Hon. Robert Morris, Secretary of the Secret Committee, and her uncle, Col. Geo. Ross, wrought into shape the first American flag.

The raising of the flag at Cambridge, Mass., January 1, 1776, known as "the Cambridge flag" (with thirteen alternate stripes of red and white, and the British Union-Jack on a field of blue), having proved wholly unsatisfactory to the patriot army, the Secret Committee gave heed to the cry for a new and suitable flag. Upon seeing the flag as raised at Cambridge, Washington cried out, "Give us a flag that shall not be hailed with acclaim by the British tyrants in Boston and the patriots at Cambridge at the same hour."

The Secret Committee had visited John Hancock, whose residence they passed on the way to the dwelling of Betsy Ross. This was in the latter part of May, 1776. They spread before Mrs. Ross a rough proof, hurriedly drawn by General Washington, and asked her if she could make a flag upon those lines. Modestly the fair revolutionist made reply, "I can try." Three days later the Committee returned, and Betsy Ross displayed to their admiring gaze the first American flag, the flag destined to become "Old Glory."

That the Committee (who in those trying days had little time for sentiment), were pleased, there can be no doubt. They immediately took the emblem straight to the old State House, and its adoption was thereupon assured, it having met the approval of General Washington and others in authority. The General gave orders for a flag of like proportions and style to be prepared for our heroes in arms in the Continental Army.

All that has been accomplished under the peerless starry emblem is recorded in history, and cannot be too often related. The founders and patriots and their revolutionary descendants and others who, seeing the beacon light of liberty, came to our rescue as devoted allies—LaFayette, the court favorite; Rochambeau, the veteran of continental Europe; Baron von Steuben, the at Yorktown, is now the flag of the greatest nation in the world.

To preserve to posterity the birthplace of the Flag, a plan was formed whereby the sons and daughters of America could share alike in the inspiring and patriotic undertaking. The following prominent citizens have been organized as a duly chartered Association: Dr. Edward Brooks, Superintendent of Public Schools, Philadelphia; Dr. Adam H. Fetterolf, President of Girard College; Hon. John Wanamaker; Ex-Governor Robert E. Pattison, of Pennsylvania; Hon. John Quincy Adams, of New York; Charles H. Weisberger, Esq., painter of the picture "Birth of our Nation's Flag;" Rev. Morgan Dix, D.D.; Superintendent John Jasper, of New York Public Schools; General Oliver Otis Howard, U. S. A.; Hon. Benj. F. Tracy; George Canby, Esq., grandson of Betsy Ross; Archbishop Patrick J. Ryan; Rabbi Joseph Krauskopf; President James MacAlister, Ph.D., of Drexel Institute, Philadelphia; Dr. Thomas Egleston, of Columbia University; Rev. Russell H. Conwell, D.D.; Col. Asa Bird Gardiner; Lieut. Francis A. Adams; George Clinton Batcheller, Esq.; Thomas Wynne, Esq.; Dr. Nathan C. Schaeffer, Superintendent of Public Instruction, State of Pennsylvania; Fred. H. Cozzens, Esq., of Detroit; Edward Payson Cone, Esq.; Hon. Lucius E. Chittenden; Sidney L. Krauss, Esq.; Rev. Henry C. McCook, D.D.; Charles W. Smith, Esq., of Philadelphia; Judge Wm. N. Ashman; Hon. Edwin S. Stuart, William A. Carr, and General Thomas J. Stewart.

Under the direction of this organization and with the patriotic co-operation of the people, the little neglected building wherein the Flag was born, has become a national temple. The Flag Association have arranged so that all Americans may participate in the movement looking toward the purchase and preservation of the Old Flag House. Any person who so desires, may receive a Certificate of Membership in the American Flag House and Betsy Ross Memorial Association upon the payment of ten cents, with four cents additional, if mailed to an individual, whose name will be engrossed upon the Certificate and an official number allotted. The Certificate is 11 x 14 inches, in six colors, and is artistically arranged, bearing on its face a picture of Betsy Ross displaying the first American Flag to the distinguished Committee—Washington, Morris and Ross. On either side is a half-tone reproduction of the Old Flag House and the grave of Betsy Ross at Mt. Moriah Cemetery. The public at large are cordially invited to give this movement their earnest and immediate attention. The purchase price of the Old Flag House was twenty-five thousand dollars, four-fifths of which has already been raised from the sale

By REV. STEPHEN MERRITT

HERE is where He desires us all to reside. He placed man in the Garden of Eden; that was lost by disobedience and distrust. He made plans for its restoration; He gave his Son to make an atonement, and sent another Comforter to restore to us what Adam lost for us, and He made it so easy and so plain that all that was necessary was for us to receive Him and the land would be no longer desolate; but it would be Beulah, and we should be no more forsaken, neglected, nor forgotten.

The Comforter has come, and we enter into our promised possessions. We do not possess this land by our piety or goodness. We do not gain it by our services or consecration. We simply receive it in connection with our reception of the Giver who gives Himself, and, with Himself, all things freely. He comes in to dwell, to abide; not to visit or to be a guest, but to remain forever. Where He is is heaven—a heaven on earth, a heaven in all our surroundings, and simply because we receive Him and give Him control. He is the Abider.

We reside in Beulah, not because we are worthy, or holy, or cultured, or useful; but because we are married and Beulah is the country seat of our "Ichi." We live there because it is the place of His residence, for of course we live with Him and enjoy all He possesses. It is a delightful land. No ravenous beast goes up there; no malaria of doubt, no miasma of distrust, no dread or fear; perfect peace and delicious quietude obtain; and there is an entire absence of malice, envy and jealousy, with nothing to mar or disturb the calm serenity of all. It is a healthy country. No sickness, sorrow, or sin has any place here. We wait on the Lord and He renews our strength; we mount up on wings as eagles; we run and weary not; we walk and never faint. He healeth all our diseases, and causeth us to rejoice evermore.

It is a fruitful heritage. We abide and fruit; we fruit because of the abiding. No fruit in or of ourselves; yet, we bring forth much fruit, and the fruitage is His, not ours. As a branch we abide, and as a vine He fruits, and the fruit remains. Blessed fruitage of Beulah! Such clusters of grapes so sweet, so satisfying.

Beulah is for everybody—rich, poor, learned, illiterate, black, white, bond, free—everybody, everywhere, at any time. He is no respecter of persons. Beulah is for the comfortless, the saddened, the sorrowful; for He is appointed to them that mourn, to give beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. Needless to say, it is blessed; the sun no more goes down, the moon never withdraws itself; the Holy Spirit is the everlasting light, and we walk in the light as He is in the light. We have fellowship one with another, and the days of our mourning are ended. We cannot purchase a site here, nor secure it by sighs, tears, or groans. It is the gift of the Comforter. Jesus died to secure Him and it for us, and we receive both as the promise of the Father, and enter into our present inheritance and enjoy Him forever. We enjoy the days of heaven on earth; though the land is situated in a vale of tears and a wilderness of woe. It is a heaven to go to heaven in. The earth rolls around the sun, a splendid sepulchre; but amid the dead of earth, with its wails and woes, rise the songs and shouts of the redeemed, who have eternal life.

Beulah is not an ecstasy; it is a reality. Its walls are Salvation, and its gates Praise. It is a highway cast up; it is for those—the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. Its people are all righteous—not their own, for our righteousness is as filthy rags; but He is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption, and therefore we inherit the land forever, that He may be glorified.

OUR CHILDREN'S HOME OPENS

THE FIRST BOAT-LOAD
SAILS UP THE HUDSON

MERRILY the children come trooping on to deck, "teachers" guiding them, dock-hands and deck-hands greeting them cheerily, and the captain smiling on them as on old acquaintances. Here and there, passengers exclaim: "O here are THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S children again!" These are people who, in their river journeyings last summer, encountered similar happy companies. Others—possibly visitors to this part of the country—are interested to know the meaning of the gay procession. For the two hours' sail from New York to Nyack, these children are a joy unto all other passengers as well as unto themselves. Ladies and gentlemen bound for summer resorts up the river, evince lively interest in the little folks from the tenements, whose intense delight in the outing, puts their own languid pleasure to the blush; and daintily-clad children of the rich look wonderingly on the children of the poor. In answer to questionings, they are informed that this is Mont-Lawn's opening day; and that these waifs represent the first company bound for that place of delights.

They sing the ballads of the streets. "You should be on the boat when that crowd returns," an old passenger observes to a new one. "They will be singing Gospel songs then, and you would think a revival were under way. In ten days this boat will be ringing with 'I am so glad that Jesus loves me.' You will note other differences, too; they will all be brown as berries; and pallid little faces will be rosy enough." The eyes of the kind-hearted wax misty when they hear a fragile girl, leading a small brother, ask: "Do they have plenty of milk up there, teacher? I heard they have plenty of milk up there." Teacher answers yes; but the girl, clasping her little brother closer, looks as if this were too good to be true, and he echoes her anxiously: "Plenty of milk, teacher? For me?" Smiles akin to tears shine on some faces when a wee questioner pipes: "Is this water the country?" He does not know what the country is; he has never seen it. This journey is to reveal to him the world of green-leaved trees, verdant fields and budding blossoms, where birds sing and where children may play on the grass.

Suddenly comes a cry: "Nyack! Nyack! The Home! The Home!" The village lies at the foot of the hill, and a few miles distant, on the side of the Hook, nestles Mont-Lawn, the jewel of the mountains, the "City of the Children," the "City Beautiful," where Christ is king, and where Christlike love and care will welcome and guard little ones. On a clear day the tower may be seen from the boat. Children shout as the Chrystenah swings toward her dock. Larger ones lift smaller ones up to see. Big stages are in waiting. "A ride! a ride!" the children cry. "Are we to have a ride, too?" What eager scrambling into coaches! And now they are bowling along through woodland and field. A chorus of "O-ohs!" and "A-ahs!" breaks forth, and "Look at the daisies! Look at the daisies!" "You may gather all you wish to-morrow," says teacher; and there is another outburst of glee. The stage turns a corner, and the children scream with delight. The Home is in view—pretty cottages and a great white tent on a green hillside, the Stars and Stripes floating above all against the blue sky. Under the wide entrance and past the picturesque Lodge the stage rolls up to the principal building, where Housemother Collins stands to welcome all the children home. Such a glad home-coming! Many of these children have been to Mont-Lawn before, and it is indeed to them a home. "Where is Dr. Klopsch?" they ask eagerly; and there are fresh outbursts of happiness when told that their friend will visit them next day.

A bountiful supper is served under the big tent which overlooks the broad blue river. Some of these children have never had a square meal before in their lives. Mountains of bread and oceans of milk disappear, and of cookies and berries there is a feast. A little play on the grass follows their repast; and then comes a happy season of story-telling in their dormitories, and the quiet hour when the little folks say their prayers, their teachers leading. They have taken great interest in their cots; many of which are supported for the season by friends whose names are tableted above or on the cots; some read these out fluently, others spell them painfully; all are grateful to benefactors, who have remembered them in this or other ways.

The little maid whose picture leads this article, is a member of the happy company now at Mont-Lawn. The parcel in her hands represents the entire dinner (with the addition of a few potatoes) for a family of seven people, a bone with some meat on it, out of which the thrifty mother was preparing to make a stew when the writer called. Katie's three little sisters are with her at the Home. Better employment has been found for the mother, who was doing sweat-shop work at starvation wages; and the father has secured a job. This family then is relieved. But there are hundreds in like condition—or worse. Will you help us send the children to Mont-Lawn. It gives the mothers a chance; and sometimes it saves the life of little starvelings for bread and air. Every summer the opening of Mont-Lawn is an occasion of joyful excitement in the tenements, and thousands of waifs are asking now, as in the past, "Can we go?"

It costs only $21 to support a cot for the season; $3 sends one child to the Home for ten days; $6 sends two; $9, three; $12, four; $36 sends a whole colony. Cash contributions should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York; gifts of garments, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

The Isthmian Canal

DEFINITE progress has at last been made in the project of the Isthmian Canal. So many years has the enterprise been before Congress, that the public had almost begun to despair of anything being done. But even our legislators appear to have become ashamed of any longer delaying its execution, and have decided on a route. Many people must be disappointed at the abandonment of the Nicaragua route, but since the Senators by some means had been brought to the stand that it must be Panama or nothing, the Panama is the better alternative. It is a disgrace to so enterprising a nation that its ships should have still to take the long course around Cape Horn, in order to reach the Pacific coast from the Atlantic. With an example of European enterprise and energy like the Suez Canal before it, it is marvelous that the nation has delayed so long to sever the isthmus of Panama. But now the flood of talk and the delay produced by conflicting interests are at last ended, and a definite proposal to acquire the French rights has passed the Senate and will doubtless be accepted by the House.

The Senate authorizes the President to pay forty million dollars for the work already done on the isthmus, and for the rights obtained for the completion of the work, providing the French company can give a clear title. So much is to be said in favor of the Panama route, that it is much shorter than that of Nicaragua, and will, therefore, not only be more direct, but will require a shorter time to navigate. We are promised, too, that there will be a saving in the annual cost of maintenance, which is, of course, an important factor. We may be sure that American genius will triumph over the natural obstacles to its construction, and we trust American probity will be proof against the financial plotting which thwarted the great French engineer in his work. The canal is to be an American canal under American control, but will be a highway of commerce for the whole world. There are still pessimists who fear that the interests which have so long delayed the work, will prove powerful enough to prevent its construction, but the advantages of a canal are so obvious, that we may hope no interest can avail to defeat the enterprise.

Commencements

A PLEASANT feature of the season, commencements of school, academy and college, attract our attention. A great host of young men and women are passing out from the halls where they have been educated, to take their share in the world's work. They are the world's finest raw material, to be fashioned by time and modified by hard knocks, and moulded by discipline, into the world's most useful products. Everywhere these young people are wanted. They are needed to take the places of the old, the weary and the dead. One by one the present-day soldiers lay down their arms; one by one the present-day workers fall out. New hands, new brains are in demand. In the professor's chair, at the forge, in the counting-room, in the editor's office, in the shop, in the pulpit, in the lawyer's sanctum, at the engine, everywhere—everywhere, friends, the world is calling you, God is calling you. Come, you who have had advantages and prove your gratitude by your works.

A Benefactor of Men

WHEN that eminent septuagenarian, the Rev. Eugene Augustus Hoffman, Dean of the General Theological Seminary, passed from earth a few days ago, ripe in years and honors, the religious world mourned the loss of a man whose memory is very dear to many an American preacher. For twenty-three years he had been at the head of the Seminary, managing its affairs down to the smallest detail, and he literally died in the harness. Dean Hoffman inherited a vast estate from his parents, and was accounted the richest clergyman in America; yet he lived very simply, and many a man of modest income made more ostentatious display of wealth and its trappings than he.

The Dean was one of those rare men whose hearts are not hardened by the possession of riches. He held his millions as a trust and used them not as a means of amassing other millions, but for the advancement of religious education and the welfare of his fellow-men. He was, in a sense, the father of the Seminary, whose splendid buildings and magnificent equipment were largely the result of his generosity. In a wider sense, he was the father of the institution, for he was the friend and special patron of every poor and struggling student who was entered there during the last quarter of a century. It is said that hundreds of young ministers owe their start in life to his princely generosity. Never did he allow any young student to suffer from lack of means to prosecute his studies. There were hundreds whom he helped to complete their course. He delighted in doing good secretly and no one will ever know the full extent of his benefactions. He was a leader among those "that scattereth and yet increaseth" and his wealth was like a spiritual endowment and a wide means of blessing and helpfulness.

Dr. Hume's Decoration

LITTLE as the American citizen cares for decorations and titles of nobility, there are some that he may well be proud of receiving. One such was shown in the office of this journal a few days ago, by Dr. R. A. Hume, of Ahmednagar, India. As our readers had a large share in enabling him to render the service which won for him the distinction, we obtained permission to photograph it, so that they might see how highly the British Government appreciates the work in which they had a part. The medal is of gold, and it is surmounted by the crown which the King of England is entitled to wear as Emperor of India. Accompanying the medal, which was entrusted to the Governor of Bombay to be delivered to Dr. Hume, was a letter, in which Lord Northcote said: "I have much pleasure in saying that, to my own personal knowledge, the good work your mission has performed in rescuing and educating many orphan children during Bombay's recent time of famine, has been of great practical value and utility."

My colleagues and I are sincerely appreciative of the excellent work you have done, and I have had the pleasure myself to see how the children are being trained and cared for."

It is very gratifying to know that the choice of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of an almoner, who would faithfully carry out the grand mission in which its readers engaged, has been endorsed by so high an authority. It is seldom that a foreign Government takes notice of missionary work; but Dr. Hume was so generously helped in his philanthropic service by our readers, that he was able to proceed on a scale which the British Government felt compelled to recognize. In the absence, through illness, of Bishop Thoburn, the chairman of The Christian Herald Interdenominational Committee, the great burden of Famine Relief work fell on Dr. Hume, and we are thankful to know that he performed his task in so efficient a way as to win this recognition.

That Dr. Hume has not compromised his standing as an American citizen by accepting this decoration from a foreign Government, is evident from the fact that when he showed it to the President, Mr. Roosevelt expressed his gratification. He said: "When you return, please say to the Governor of Bombay and to all others, that I feel genuine pride that this distinction was conferred upon an American citizen, and that America could help India in her time of distress."

* * *

—DURING HIS lifetime, Dr. Talmage was frequently the victim of plagiarists. Now that he has gone, there are some who seem to think they are at liberty to appropriate and to preach and publish Dr. Talmage's sermons and other literary productions as they may see fit. In Colorado, Nebraska and Ohio, a certain evangelist is preaching and printing these sermons as his own. Emboldened by temporary success in his literary larcenies, the evangelist recently hurled at his admiring audiences as an original poem, the famous description of hell, from Pollock's Course of Time. Let us hope that the exposure of this persistent offender may act as a warning to others.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Rejoicing in Heaven

—AS SOON AS you pass the dividing line there will be shouting all up and down the heavens. The crowned immortals will look down and cheer. Jesus of the many scars will rejoice at the result of his earthly sacrifices. Departed saints will be gladdened that their prayers are answered. An order will be given for the spreading of a banquet at which you will be the honored guest. From the Imperial Gardens the wreaths will be twisted for your brow, and from the halls of Eternal Music the harpers will bring their harps, and the trumpeters their trumpets, and all up and down the amethystine stairways of the castles, and in all the rooms of the House of Many Mansions, it will be talked over with holy glee that this day while one plain man stood on the platform of this vast building giving the Gospel call, an assemblage made up from all parts of the earth and piled up in these galleries, chose Christ as their portion, and started for heaven as their everlasting home. Ring all the bells of heaven at the tidings! Strike all the cymbals at the joy! Wave all the palm branches at the triumph! Victory! Victory!

Christian Philanthropy

—GATHER UP all the merciful work that Infidelity has ever done, add it all together, and there is not so much nobility in it as in the smallest bead of that deaconess who last night went up the dark alley of the town and put a jar of jelly for an invalid appetite on a broken stand, and then knelt on the bare floor, praying the mercy of Christ upon the dying soul. Infidelity scrapes no lint for the wounded, bakes no bread for the hungry, shakes up no pillow for the sick, rouses no comfort for the bereft, gilds no grave for the dead. While Christ, our Christ, our wounded Christ, our risen Christ, the Christ of this old-fashioned Bible—blessed be his glorious name forever!—our Christ stands this morning pointing to the hospital, or to the asylum, saying, "I was sick and ye gave me a couch, I was lame and ye gave me a crutch, I was blind and ye physicianed my eyesight, I was orphaned and ye mothered my soul, I was lost on the mountains and ye brought me home; inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

Magnifying Trifles

—OH, HOW particular a great many people are about the infinitesimals, while they are quite reckless about the magnitudes. What did Christ say? Did he not exhort the people in his time who were so careful to wash their hands before a meal, but did not wash their hearts? It is a bad thing to have unclean hands; it is a worse thing to have an unclean heart. How many people there are in our time who are very anxious that after their death they shall be buried with their face toward the east, and not at all anxious that during their whole life they should face in the right direction, so that they shall come up in the resurrection of the just whichever way they are buried. How many there are chiefly anxious that a minister of the Gospel shall come in the line of apostolic succession, not caring so much whether he comes from Apostle Paul or Apostle Judas.

False Perspective

—COME NOW, let us go into the confessional. Are not all tempted to make the question, Where shall I live now? greater than the question, Where shall I live forever? How shall I get more dollars here? greater than the question, How shall I lay up treasures in heaven? The question, How shall I pay my debts to man? greater than the question, How shall I meet my obligations to God? The question, How shall I gain the world? greater than the question, What if I lose my soul? The question, Why did God let sin come into the world? greater than the question, How shall I get it extirpated from my nature? The question, What shall I do with the twenty or forty or seventy years of my sublunar existence? greater than the question, What shall I do with the millions of cycles of my post-terrestrial existence? Time, how small it is! Eternity, how vast it is!

The Gospel Pillow

—I HAVE NOTICED that on the dying bed there are apt to be four or five pillows, in order to give easy position to the departing loved one—rumped and disheveled pillows. Sometimes it is one pillow under the head, and at other times another pillow. My brother, when you and I leave this world, we want our choice of pillows. Let it not be a pillow of regrets, for that is stuffed with nettles. Let it not be a pillow of gloomy anticipations, for that is stuffed with nightshade. Rather let it be the soft, soothing, comforting pillow filled with what David, the Psalmist, in powerful metaphor has been pleased to call, "The feathers of the Almighty."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Irish Exposition

LITTLE has been said in the cable dispatches about the International Exposition in the city of Cork, but it is evident that it is really an extensive and important affair. The Irish city has had expositions before this, but when this one was first suggested, a deputation was sent to Glasgow to confer with the committee which had managed the Exposition there, and advice was obtained which led to the planning of a much better enterprise than had been contemplated. The lessons the Scotch people had learned were put freely at the disposal of the Irish managers, and the latter have thereby learned what to do and what to avoid. The result is a singularly graceful collection of buildings, and an assemblage of just those exhibits which most interest visitors. The entertainment of the visitors, too, has not been overlooked. The Irishman who goes to the Exposition is on a holiday, and wants more pleasure than he can obtain from mere sight-seeing. If he wends his way to the Hall of Music, he is delighted. There is room in it for five thousand persons, and the orchestra is one of the finest ever organized in Ireland. The exhibits are chiefly of Irish products and manufactures. Woolen serges and fine linens are manufactured in the Exposition, so that the process from beginning to end can be traced. Laces and wonderful embroideries are also among the prominent exhibits. The machinery hall and the electrical display are also a revelation, especially to visitors who have never been out of the Emerald Isle in their lives. Every one who has heard the story of the poverty of Ireland, will hope that this enterprise will result in the revival of its trade and in bringing it prosperity. We may hope, too, the efforts of evangeduly rung out on the bell, and the electrician, dropping the wires from his burned hands, fell exhausted. Happily after a rest and medical help, he recovered; but he was terribly shaken by the current that passed through his body. It was a bold thing to do, but he saw no other way of averting a calamity. We admire a man so brave as this, but how few remember that all our hopes for eternity are founded on an infinitely greater act of self-sacrifice.

By a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh (Heb. 10: 20).

A Rose as Rental

An interesting ceremony was witnessed at Manheim, Pa., on June 8th. The Zion Evangelical Lutheran congregation occupy a church there, which was crowded to its utmost capacity. A large number of prominent persons were on the platform, including Dr. J. W. Houston, of Lancaster, Pa. He was present as the representative of Miss M. Horning, a lineal descendant of Baron Stiegel. After addresses by the pastor of the congregation, Dr. Talcott Williams, of Philadelphia, and Rev. Luther L. Lohr, of Williamsport, a beautiful red rose was handed to Dr. Houston, who gave a formal receipt for it. The significance of the gift recalls the memories of a hundred and thirty years. In 1765 willing to accept this, which, being infected, might cause them to have the disease. There is not much money of that kind in circulation, but it does seem as if some money has the power of destroying the spiritual life of its possessor.

Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall eat your flesh as it were fire (James 5: 3).

A Surprised Rescuer

A most astonished and thankful hero was he whose deed of daring is the talk of the Hudson River Yacht Club this week. The Club was holding a reception for the friends of the members, their wives and families at the home of the club at Ninety-second street, New York. There was a large float moored outside the house, and during the festivities a number of the children went upon it to play. They had not been there more than half an hour when the guests heard them screaming in terror that a boy was drowning. A little six-year-old had slipped off the float into the deep water. In an instant, the Commodore of the club, who happened to be standing on the balcony, leaped into the water without waiting to divest himself of his coat or shoes. He caught the child as he rose to the surface, and was amazed to see that it was his own son. He was so overcome that he could scarcely move, but soon recovered and swam with him to the bank, where eager hands relieved him of his burden. The boy was unconscious, but with medical aid was restored. How thankful must that father have been that he plunged into the river at once, though he knew not how dear the imperilled child was to him! It is that spirit of ready helpfulness in all the relations of life, that Christ inculcated in the Parable of the Good Samaritan.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE EXPOSITION AT CORK

Baron Stiegel settled at Manheim, and built the first glass factory in America. He prospered, and started an iron foundry, growing very wealthy from those and other industries. In 1770, he deeded to the Lutheran congregation land on which a church was built. He stipulated that the ground should still be considered his property, but neither he nor his heirs would require any rent for it save one red rose, which should be presented in perpetuity to his descendants by the congregation. It was an eccentric idea, which is more common in Europe than here. The Baron certainly made the burden of rent as light for the congregation as he could. The nominal rent served to remind them that they did not actually own the land, though they had possession of it on such easy terms. There are some people who seem to need such a reminder in dealing with God; they act as if no tribute to him were required.

Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings (Malachi 3: 8).

Infected Money

A physician in Jersey City, N. J., is custodian of a considerable sum of money which he does not know how to dispose of. A few days ago he was called to attend a sailor, who was lying ill in a boarding-house. The man had refused to be undressed, but when the doctor came he was impressed by the honesty he read in his countenance, and suffered the doctor to remove his clothes. He was greatly excited and was evidently not altogether in his right mind. Underneath his shirt, next to his skin, the doctor found a large roll of bills. He showed them to the patient, who nodded, and asked the doctor to take care of them. It proved to be a case of small-pox, and the patient was sent to the hospital for infectious diseases. The doctor was about to put the money he had taken from the patient into his bank, when it occurred to him that it must be reeking with disease germs. He therefore put it into a hermetically sealed envelope, where it now is. He says it would never be safe to put it into circulation, and he is considering the propriety of applying to the Government for permission to destroy it, if they will give new bills in lieu of it. Ardently as many people desire money, it is doubtful if any one could be found who would be ists in preaching to the crowds who attend will be blessed, for it is still true, as it was in the days of Moses, though the nations who are depressed often forget the fact, that

It is the Lord thy God who giveth thee power to get wealth (Deut. 8: 18).

A Living Connection

A hazardous experiment was tried by an electrician at York, Pa., a few days ago. He went up into the tower of the engine-house at the fire-alarm station to replace some of the wires which had become defective. He had just severed the faulty wires when he realized by his experience as an electrician that some one at a distance was calling the fire brigade. He knew that he alarm might be a very urgent matter, but he had broken the connection which would ring the bell. The man at the other end had recognized that something was wrong, and was repeating the call, but unless the wire was connected with the bell, there was no clue to the locality from which the alarm came. He had cut away four feet of wire, so there was no way of making it reach the bell. In the emergency, he determined to put his own life in jeopardy. Taking the end of the wire in one hand, and the connection with the bell in the other, he made of his body a living conductor, suffering the current to pass through it. The strokes were and other teachings. He wished all his followers to cherish it, no matter who the beneficiary might be. The blessing of obedience, whether in material or spiritual things may be greater than we expect.

What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? Or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife? (1 Cor. 7: 16).

BRIEF NOTES

The India Endeavorer for May contains an editorial very earnestly supporting India's invitation for the World's Christian Endeavor Convention to meet in Calcutta in 1904 or 1905.

Mrs. Ernestine Schaffner, who was the first woman to do volunteer missionary work among the prisoners in the New York Tombs, is dead. She began the work twenty-five years ago, and combined substantial assistance with religious teaching. She frequently engaged lawyers to defend needy prisoners. Nearly all of her private means was consumed in the work. Judges knew and respected Mrs. Schaffner, and many prisoners were granted consideration through her appeals.

The Young Men's Christian Associations are developing and extending the feature of summer camps for boys between the ages of twelve and eighteen. These camps proved exceedingly successful last year. To each group of ten boys a leader is assigned, who advises and guides them while they are under canvas. Some properties have been acquired for these camps. A lady gave a large island off the coast of Maine for the Massachusetts and Rhode Island boys. Montreal boys have an island in Canada. Philadelphia has a farm of 450 acres. Cleveland has leased a farm with a lake and river on it near the city. Vacation time is often a perilous time in life, but the Association means to make it a making time of character.

MICHEL ANGELO'S STATUE OF MOSES

MOSES EXHIBITING THE TABLES OF THE LAW

Man's Loving Loyalty to God

* The Ten Commandments Duties to God

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 13
EXODUS 20: 1-11

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- LUKE 10: 27:
"THOU SHALT LOVE THE LORD THY GOD WITH ALL THY HEART"

THREE months had passed since the Israelites had crossed the Red Sea. In wonderful ways God had shown that his presence was with them; in the turning back of the sea, so that they might cross on dry land; in the drowning of their pursuers; in the healing of the waters, when they were almost overcome with thirst, and found waters that were bitter ("The Lord showed Moses a tree, which, when he had cast into the waters, the waters were made sweet"); in the greater miracle, when a second time they were without water to drink, and God made water come out of a dry rock, so that it flowed like a river; in the gift of daily manna and of quails for food; in his deliverance when they were attacked by a new foe, the Amalekites.

But, notwithstanding all these mercies, God saw that it would be hard to keep the hearts of the Hebrew people loyal to him and to Moses, whom he had placed over them. They had indeed already rebelled, and wished themselves back in Egypt. And so God devised a plan to make it as easy as possible for them to do right. He gave to Moses for them what we call the "Ten Commandments," which were not arbitrary rules, but rather the terms of a covenant, in the keeping of which the Israelites were to show their love and loyalty to God, while God, on his part, was to continue his presence with them. "If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people" (Ex. 19: 5).

Wonderful is the story of how God communicated his law to the people. It was given in an enduring form, even engraved upon stone by God's own finger. The day when God handed it down from heaven was a never-to-be-forgotten day. For three days the people were in preparation for that day. They cleansed themselves, bodies and clothes, and then stood together around about the mountain, even Mount Sinai, up which Moses had gone to receive the precious law from the hand of God. And the whole mountain trembled and shook, and a great smoke rose as if the mountain were on fire, and there were thunders and lightnings. The sight was terribly grand. By the command of God, through Moses, the people had been put at safe distance. A barrier, perhaps of bushes, had been put around the mountain to show the people how far they could come. When all was ready, a trumpet sounded long, and grew louder and louder until Moses spoke, and God answered him, calling him to come up to the top of the mountain, which Moses did in awe.

And when God had communed a while with Moses on the mountain, he gave him the law on two tables of stone. It is thought that the first table contained only duties to God, which would make the first table include not five commandments, not even four, but end with the first sentence of the Sabbath commandment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." That is the middle period of the Decalogue, and the actual point where duties to God are succeeded by duties to man, for the remainder of the Sabbath command regulates, for the whole week, the relations of parent and child, of master and servant, of native and alien, in the matter of work and rest. The Sabbath, is not alone "The Lord's Day," for Jesus said it was "made for man." It is the keystone in the arch of commandments, where duties to God pass over into duties to man. "Duties to God" are our theme for to-day.

Illustration and Application

The Jews called the Pentateuch the five-volume book of Moses, "The Book of the Law." It was really a law library, and we need to study a law library to understand it. Go to a lawyer's office, and you will find the law in three kinds of volumes. First, there is the Constitution, the fundamental law, expressed in a few great provisions. Then are the more profuse statute laws, many of them of local or temporary application. But most of the lawyer's volumes are devoted to judicial decisions, in which great judges have applied law principles to difficult cases, where the bearing of the constitution and statutes was not self-evident. To an uninformed man, it may seem a waste of space to keep on the shelves the story of what a supreme court of some other country decided in the case of two litigants a hundred years ago, but under the ancient history there is an eternal principle of law revealed, that may be reapplied in some like case to-morrow. Old Testament histories are such law books. In the old stories of Abraham and Joseph, we have the decisions of the Judge of all in the Supreme Court of the Universe, giving us law principles to guide our relations to God and man to-day. There are also in the Bible numerous statute laws, some of which have fulfilled their local and temporary purpose, and for that reason are no longer of force, but those that apply to universal sins and needs are as binding as ever. Above these statutes, as the mountains tower above the foothills, rise the Ten Commandments—the world's constitution in ten articles—written in rock, in token of the fact they were first written in the very nature of things. Cain was not innocent because the words "Thou shalt not kill" were not written in the law till twenty-five hundred years after. It is sufficient evidence that the Decalogue was of more than mortal perfection, that Justinian, Charlemagne and Alfred, in making the greatest modern codes of law for the civilized and Christianized world, each began with the "Ten Words" that were first used by a horde of slaves just escaped from idolatrous Egypt, from which code not a virtue of Christianity was omitted, in which not a sin was excused or condoned. This Decalogue is the "Master Clock" of the world to-day as a standard of morals. By it every civilized nation sets its laws, every good man his conduct.

The great clock in the naval observatory is called the Master Clock. By means of the repeating apparatus, the time is repeated over eighteen different circuits to the various parts of the country. If you should happen to be in some large telegraph office at the moment the time signal is being sent out, it is likely you would see the operators at their keys take out their watches a few seconds before the time is due, open them, put a tiny piece of tissue paper twisted into a thread between the spokes of one of the little wheels in their watches, holding back the movement to the instant the signal is given, then releasing the wheel so that the watch shall fall into the exact beat of the Master Clock in Washington.

The time-ball is an interesting feature of the service. It is a round ball large enough to be seen from the street where, supported by its appliances, it rests on the top of some building. It is attached by wire to the circuit from Washington in such a manner that, at the instant the Master Clock in Washington ticks the stroke of twelve the delicately poised ball will fall, in many cities, released by the same beat of the clock that announces the time to the rest of the country, and hundreds of men halt, waiting for the falling ball that they may set their watches right to a second. Oh, that men would daily compare their lives with God's law, and set them right, with Divine help, by that standard.

Thou shalt have no other gods before me. What God requires here is supreme loyalty to him. For our good, we are forbidden to put sun or moon, money or fame, in the throne of our lives. God is the Good One, and in the worship of him we make goodness first—to be good and do good—and relegate all other things innocent to secondary consideration. This is to be no servile, unwilling obedience, but our loyalty is to be also love, as when the subject of a king is also his son. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, mind and strength." This means consecration of body, mind and soul to do God's will, not grudgingly, but heartily and earnestly. Duty means something due, a debt. We are called to serve God not alone as a duty, but from affection. Tholuck said, "I was converted when religion ceased to be a duty and became a privilege."

"Mamma," said a six-year-old Fred, "I can't love God and you both, so I'll choose you."

"Why my child! What do you mean by saying that you cannot love both?"

Three Kinds of Love "Cause that's what the Sunday School lesson says; it says that I must love God with all my heart, and there isn't but one 'all' to it, so if I love him with all, there won't be one bit left for you."

Mamma laughed, and only asked Fred to come with her. Going to the cellar, she quietly asked him to help her fill a large pan with potatoes.

"There," said he, piling on the last big fellow, "it's full." "Full, yet there's room," answered mother, and she next took a bag of beans and commenced to shake them into the crevices between the potatoes. She poured and shook until a quart or more had disappeared, and the pan was speckled with white.

"Neither is it full yet," she said; and taking up a shovel-full of sand, she scattered that over the pan, and it, too, disappeared, and another after it.

"Not full yet," she said again, as she took up a cup and began pouring water on the pan; and she poured and poured until several quarts were gone.

"Now, you see how a thing can be full, and yet hold more of something else. So your heart may be full of the love of God, and plenty of room left for me, and papa, and sister, and play, and books."

It may be worth while to repeat for new readers how the writer was relieved in early life of a conscientious perplexity because he did not love God with quite the same warmth that he loved his mother. He found relief in the explanation that there are three kinds of love: First, the love of esteem and reverence and loyalty, with which one looks up to a leader to whom he is devoted—this is the kind of love with which we love God; second, the love of sympathy with which we love our relatives and boon companions, of like standing and purposes with ourselves; third, the love of pity and compassion, that looks down to lift up those who seem less favored. Conscientious persons are troubled because even in doing good they act from mixed motives. But if God's will is dominant like a king among these various motives, we have kept the First Commandment, and the "great commandment" as well.

Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image. A Roman Catholic woman, reading the Bible for the first time, when she had reached the Second Commandment, stopped and broke her crucifix before going on with her reading. Roman Catholic priests say to the heathen, our crucifix is not an idol, but only a symbol. And the heathen answer, Our idols, too, are only symbols. God knew human hearts and how easily they would come to regard the symbols as gods, and worship them in place of the invisible One, who must be worshiped in spirit, which is much harder than going through empty forms. The absurdity of idol worship is humorously pictured by a Port Royal pilot, who was wrecked in the Bay of Bengal years ago. Only three escaped to land. They were soon in straits of hunger, but from a hiding place saw natives set savory dishes before a huge idol. They concluded to "take board with the idol" and eat these savory dishes each day when the natives had gone away. They did so for awhile, but were discovered in the very act at last, and had to flee from the country. To worship an idol by bringing him food he cannot eat may seem very absurd, but from heaven it looks yet more absurd to give anything else the throne of our hearts that belongs to God—for example, to put there beautiful dresses or piles of money or titles and honors. O God, thou hast made us for thyself, and our hearts are restless till they are filled with thee.

Michelangelo's "Moses"

The statue of Moses, made by Michelangelo, is considered one of the greatest statues in the world. It seems almost ready to rise up and command us. It is said that Michelangelo, having finished it, struck it with his chisel, saying, "Moses, why do you not speak to me?" Note that his right arm rests upon the tables of the law. His long, flowing beard suggests the veneration in which he was held by the Jews. The "horns" indicate power, and are said to have been suggested by the flames which rested in the heads of the Apostles when the Holy Spirit descended at Pentecost.

In the Golden Summer

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WEDDING PRESENTS

NOT long ago in a suburban town in Connecticut, the newspapers reported that the employees of an express company gave up their positions in despair, because they could not cope with the immense number of wedding presents to be delivered, June, as usual, had brought not only roses and daisies, but merry marriage peals. Every June is signalized by the entrance of the bride in her white attire, and the founding of many new homes, where young people together begin their blended lives. With us it is customary, and the custom is very ancient, and is confined to no single country or nation, to bestow gifts on the newly wedded pair, the larger portion of them being a tribute to the beauty, popularity, and sweetness of the bride. It is conventionally proper to send presents to the bride's home at any time after invitations to the wedding are sent out, and the young woman at once acknowledges them in a note of thanks to the giver, written in the first person singular. These notes are the last she may sign with her maiden name, dropped at the altar for that of her husband, or merged into her new surname by becoming a modest middle name. Thus, Alice Goodnow, on her marriage, may become Alice Goodnow Brown, or Smith, or may simply thereafter be Alice Smith. In some families there is a pretty method of keeping the wife's maiden name in use, by giving it as a secondary name to every child born in the household. This is not obligatory, but is a matter of choice, and individual preference.

To return to the wedding presents. The instance to which allusion has been made, of their formidable number in one town and week, reminds us that some brides are very fortunate in this special incidental item of their marriage. For a wedding present may take a very convenient form, or may fit with marvelous nicety into a waiting niche. A rich father may present his daughter with a new home outright. No gift is more appreciated than that of a house and lot. Sometimes a generous check from her father is placed on the table with the bride's other gifts. She thus begins her new life with a certain independence, and in passing, let it be said that no young woman should enter her married life without a few pennies of her very own in her purse. She will be the happier not too soon to have to ask John for money.

Wedding presents are chosen from a very varied catalogue of useful and ornamental articles. Cut glass, china, silver, bric-a-brac, pictures, lace, jewels, and books are among the things of special value, which people in search of gifts examine, and among which they make selections. Anything which may be utilized in house-keeping will be welcome. Silver gifts would better not be engraved by the senders, and, since they are apt to be duplicated by different friends, it is kind to let the bride know whence they came, that if she wish she may exchange them for something else which she needs more. If silver is left unmarked, the bride may have it engraved at her pleasure, with her maiden or her married monogram or initials.

If we would send acceptable wedding presents, we must take some thought about the circumstances of the young people to whom they go. To a struggling young lawyer, or a clerk on a modest salary, do not send an elaborate silver service, which must be kept in a safe at the bank, nor a heavy and costly bowl or platter which overshadows everything else the bride may receive.

Do not in any case send a gift out of proportion to your own means. Undoubtedly it is a tax upon slender pocket-books to return wedding gifts, and there is an unwritten law that such gifts are to be reciprocal. If Aline marries in June, and receives gifts from Dorothy, Margery and Christine, she is in honor bound to send each of these girls something when she marries. A recognition of the sweet underlying sentiment of the gift, and an honest independence would, in most cases, prevent the element of the burden from forcing itself in.

The Summer Girl

THE little phrase is picturesque. The summer girl is a vision of delight. In winter she is at home, and is not apt to be seen by strangers unless they are properly presented, but in the summer, she is at the mountain caravansary, and in the seaside inn, and on the steamer, and more or less in the public eye, and she is wearing trim shirt-waists and sensible shoes and short skirts, as she tramps, or golfs, or travels, and people observe and admire her for her health and beauty. Perhaps she is not specially athletic. The pendulum is swinging the other way this summer, and the girl that Gibson and Christie have drawn in out-door attitudes, is giving place to the elegant young lady of daintier texture and more exquisite type. This girl is a reversal to the lady who was Jane Austin's ideal, though she is stronger, less willowy, and more fearless of a draft than that old-fashioned heroine. But she, the summer girl of 1902, has gone back to trailing gowns, diaphanous and fluffy creations of the dressmaker, and alas! to high-heeled shoes.

Whatever she may wear, the summer girl is sure to be adored. She is in the front of the stage. In the background hover a crowd of young gentlemen, endowed with the temporary leisure of the summer vacation, or set free from college by their graduation. These boys see the summer girl, beg for an introduction, and are presently at her feet. Well for her if she keep a steady head. Their homage is agreeable while it lasts, but it means little, and the summer girl should be on her guard against taking it too seriously. Girls, at all seasons, should not hold themselves cheaply. For the sake of a transient good time, a girl sometimes mars her self-respect and loses the place she ought to have in the respect of others. Mothers, too, should keep vigilant watch over their daughters when away from home, and where the restraints of home are somewhat relaxed, the girls are exposed to the unscrupulous and the cruel among men. A glance at the records in the daily papers shows how often young and thoughtless girls are led into very questionable situations, partly through their inexperience and partly through the laxity of those who should protect them. Now and then the community is startled and shocked by a dreadful tragedy, luridly in contrast with the prevalent summer gaiety and gladness, and when the curtain is lifted one sees how heedless and irresponsible was the victim, how heartless and selfish the betrayer. Mothers must not abdicate too soon. The young girl, in her lovely flush of early womanhood, needs as much loving dominance and careful surveillance as the wee maiden did when she played on beach or hills in short frocks.

Far be it from the present writer to forget that, while a few men are brutal and dishonorable, the great majority are honest, clean and sincere. Were it otherwise, society would fall apart from its weakened links. Our men are hard-working; they have few holidays; they are loyal to their good mothers and pure sisters; they reflect the spirit of the women around them; they are anticipating eagerly the day when they may call some good woman by the hallowed name of wife. Sometimes they make the acquaintance which ripens into love, under the waving trees and by the babbling brooks and on the mountain slopes, in the summer days. When a man falls in love with a summer girl and she worthily returns it, she may become the guardian angel of his hearth, the star of his future, the joy of his life. One day they may sing together:

John Anderson, my Jo, John,
When we were first acquaint,
Your locks were like the raven,
Your bonny brow was bent.

And when the raven locks are snowed over with white and the bonny brow is wrinkled, the two will contentedly fare down life's hill hand-in-hand.

Chapter XXXII.—Continued

TO do Mrs. Scott justice, she sincerely desired to improve the matrimonial situation, and she knew enough of her granddaughter's character to convince her that it was she who was at fault.

"Did you say 'Manuel was out to the barn?'" Inquired the old lady mildly. "I'd kind of like to see him before I go."

"Yes, and tell him I'm feverish and need boneset or thorough-wort or some other mess," said Hilda. "I don't know where he is; I guess he's gone to the post-office; but, truly, grandma, I'm not a bit sick; I'm just mad!"

"Well, that's bein' sick enough fer boneset," said Mrs. Scott with spirit. "I've give it to you more'n once when you was little, an' it took the temper right out of ye."

Hilda laughed in spite of herself. "Really you're too funny, grandma," she said with a touch of patronizing indulgence. "I should think it would take the temper out of almost any one the way you fix it. But I'm sure you'd agree with me if you knew all that I do." Thereupon she set forth at length her visit to New York, including her interview with Mrs. Smalley, the greater part of whose remarks she quoted with astonishing accuracy.

"That woman's a busy-body," quoth Mrs. Scott sententiously. "She's got an ax to grind, I'll warrant ye. Don't you pay no 'tention to what she said."

"Why, grandma, she was perfectly lovely! You ought to have seen her dress, all lined with silk and—"

"Fine feathers don't make fine birds," quoted the old lady, shaking her head. "She was tryin' to set you against your husband, an' that's what no lady'll ever do, whether her dress is lined with silk or caliker. Now Hildy, I'd advise ye to put this hull thing outen your head. You've got as nice a home here as any woman in the world need ask for, an' as good a husband. As fur as I kin make out from what you say, 'Manuel's got the right of it. He ain't a mite selfish."

"I call it disgustingly selfish to think more of those horrid slum people than he does of me," pouted Hilda.

"He don't think more of 'em, an' you know he don't," said Mrs. Scott earnestly. "He jest worships the ground you walk on, Hildy; but you don't want to cut up so 'at he'll be sick of you. An' I'll tell you another thing, you want to remember 'at you thought he was jest a poor farmer with nothin' but this little place to his name, when he was courtin' you. He never let on to one of us 'bout his money. He's done everythin' he promised to by ye, an' a lot more. You want to remember that, Hildy."

"I'd never have married him in the world, if I'd known," said Hilda sulkily.

"If you'd known what—for the land's sake!" exclaimed the old lady wrathfully.

"I declare to goodness, Hildy, you don't deserve nothin' in the world so much as a good hard settin' down to bring ye to yer senses. An' ef you was five 'stead of twenty you'd git it too this minit."

"I don't think it's at all nice for you to talk to me that way," said Hilda, rising with a great display of matronly dignity.

"Oh, here's Immanuel. I'm so glad."

She kissed her husband with unwonted warmth, and his eyes brightened happily as they rested for a moment on the charming face. "I'm glad you came to see this little wife of mine, grandma," he said cheerfully. "I tried to persuade her to drive with me this glorious afternoon, but she said 'no' very decidedly. Perhaps she guessed some welcome visitor was at hand."

Hilda was busy with her embroidery now, she looked up to smile with a dazzling display of white teeth and dimples. "Grandma has been scolding me," she said sweetly.

"No, I haven't," promptly denied the old lady. "I found her cryin' and sulkin' when I came in," she went on, turning to Immanuel, with the brisk air of a good disciplinarian, "and I just giv her a piece of my mind, that's all."

The young man turned a distressed and inquiring gaze upon his wife. "Crying," he said, "Why were you crying, dear?"

Her lips trembled a little like a child's on the verge of sobs. "I don't want to talk about it now," she said.

"Hump! I guess I'll be going," observed Mrs. Scott, rising with an openly sarcastic sniff. "If you ain't onhitched, 'Manuel, I'd like you to drive me home. I've stayed longer 'an I meant to."

Once seated comfortably in the carriage, the excellent matron turned her shrewd eyes upon the grave, troubled face at her side. "I've known Hildy sence she was a baby," she began, "an' while, of course, me an' her gran'pa think the world an' all of the child—as is no more 'n natural, seein' she's our only gran'child, I ain't blinded to her faults. She's awful set on havin' her own way, Hildy is, an' it don't make no manner of difference whether it's a good way or not, she jes' sticks to it through thick an' thin. Her pa allers spoiled her when she was to home; an' his second wife didn't have any more government 'an a tow string. When she was with us, she minded me, you'd better believe; but I didn't have her constant enough to make any impression. She's pretty well spoiled, Hildy is."

Immanuel drew his brows together with a displeased frown. "I have no idea of establishing a reign of law in my house," he said coldly. "My wife is certainly entitled to her opinions."

"Of course, you can't see things as I do," retorted Mrs. Scott. "An' I don't know as I want you should. I guess I'll hold my tongue in futur', but there's plenty of folks as 'ull advise ye worse, an' her, too. That Mrs. Smalley she saw down there set as many foolish notions to hatchin' in her head, as I'd put eggs under my ol' gray hen."

Immanuel looked puzzled and inquiring, but he said nothing; and presently set his grandmother-in-law safely down at her own door.

"So he's awful rich, is he?" soliloquized the old lady grimly, as she watched him drive away. "Well, money's a good thing, but he'll be 'bleeged to live and larn, I reckon, same as the rest of us hev to."

With which epigrammatic statement she walked into the house with an energetic step.

Immanuel carefully avoided any reference to this conversation, but he was more anxiously devoted to his young wife than ever. A new piano was sent from the city, and because Hilda's musical knowledge and skill were of the slightest, a marvelous device for reproducing the great music of the centuries accompanied it. There were new books, too, and the latest magazines. Hilda once expressed a desire to ride, and a gentle pony took up his residence in the old red barn. But the listless face of the recipient of all these gifts reproached the giver ceaselessly. She said little; she sewed vast quantities of embroidery silk into endless bits of linen cloth.

"Would you not like to ask some visitors to spend a month with us, dear?" he asked her one day, after he had watched the needle with its trail of pink flash in and out for half a hundred times.

"I don't think so," she said, without lifting her eyes. "I don't see what we could do to entertain them in this dull place."

"There are plenty of people not far away," he said hesitatingly. "Why should we not make the acquaintance of our neighbors?"

"I do not care to know the people here," she replied chillingly. "But, of course, I must do what you say."

He sighed and resumed his solitary reading. "There is such a capital bit here, Hilda; shall I read it to you?" he said after a little.

"If you like"—indifferently. But she did not once smile at the inimitable humor of Holmes; after reading a few pages he laid down the book abruptly and left the room. The blue eyes followed him with a curious unrelentingness. There was a silent war of wills going on between these two, and Hilda was perfectly aware of it.

As for Immanuel, he was not far from being entirely miserable. He went wearily over the whole matter with himself for the hundredth time. "I have been selfish," he said at last. "I have deceived myself and wronged her. I ought not to have expected her to be happy here with me alone."

This singular young man was just as far as ever from understanding the situation from Hilda's point of view, as was evinced by a letter which he presently wrote to his lawyers. "We have decided to come to town for the winter. Look up for me a house of moderate cost in one of the suburban districts," was the substance of it.

"Will you drive with me to the village, dearest," he asked, bending over the small figure in the big chair.

"No, I think not; it is too windy to drive to-day," she replied, with a resigned sigh.

He had intended to tell her at once of his resolve, but her manner chilled him. "Very well," he said, in a tone of forced cheerfulness, and busied himself with the fire till it crackled merrily up the chimney.

Left to herself, Hilda shed a few vague tears. She wished she had gone to the village. "Anything is better than this dreary house!" she muttered, and settled down to a comfortable fit of sulks, during which she held herself up before her mental vision as a wonderfully patient but much abused woman. "Perhaps I shall be sick and die after a while," she said aloud; "I guess he would be sorry then!" She even allowed herself to depict a lovely snow-white figure, cold and dead, over which her hard-hearted husband was shedding remorseful tears. This picture was so excessively pathetic that Hilda wept over it convulsively.

Self-pity is the most ignoble of all the emotions; but how was our poor Hilda to know this? She pitied herself, and cried until the natural reaction set in; this led her up stairs and into her prettiest gown.

"I wish somebody would come now!" she said aloud, as she surveyed her reflection in the mirror.

Chapter XXXIII.

'Rastus Winch Performs his Vow.

THE fulfillment of the wish followed close upon its utterance. Hilda had scarce finished putting the last dainty touches to her toilet, when the maid announced a visitor. "An' if you don't mind, Mis' Rossi, I'll be goin' to the farm now after more cream. There ain't none fur the tay."

Hilda nodded her assent to this proposal. "Who is down there, Rosa?" she inquired.

"Just an 'old, farmer-lookin' man, ma'am," replied the girl. "He axed was Mr. Rossi to home, an' I says, no, sir. Then I'll see his woman, he says, an' me business is keen, or words like him. I showed him to the settin' room."

Hilda frowned. "How tiresome!" she exclaimed sharply, and swept down the narrow stairs with the air of a duchess, entering the room where her visitor waited.

He was a tall stoop-shouldered man, with straggling hair and whiskers of dingy gray; this much Hilda observed at a glance. He had not removed his hat, she further remarked with a displeased stare. Beneath its dusty brim, a pair of small savage eyes looked out with a curious sparkle. For the rest, the stranger was shabbily dressed, and carried in one hand a heavy whip. A shiver of repulsion passed through Hilda's slight figure; she drew back and laid her hand upon the door. "You—you asked to see me?" she began in a low voice. "Mr. Rossi is not at home, and I—"

The man burst into a short, rasping laugh. "I ain't so awful sorry on that 'count," he said; "I kinder reckoned I'd fin' him gone. You're his wife, I per-soom?"

"I am Mrs. Rossi—yes, certainly; won't you tell me your business, if you please?" Hilda was not unaccustomed to dealing with the farming population. It occurred to her that this singular individual was perhaps an embarrassed purveyor of dairy products, or possibly a sewing machine agent. After a second glance at the lowering face of her visitor, she decided that she would dismiss him without delay.

"I don't care to buy anything to-day, thank you," she added, drawing herself up decidedly. "I am very much engaged just now; I will ask the maid to show you—" She stopped short, remembering with a second disagreeable shiver that she had permitted the girl to leave the house.

"Wall, now, I guess ye don't want ter get red of me so quick; I've waited fer quite a spell to see you," said the man, advancing two or three steps. "An' I vow ye'r wuth seein'; I guess ye'r quite a leetle han'somer 'an my wife wuz. No, you ain't a-goin' to leave me jest yit; I ain't got through with ye, not by no means!"

Hilda drew back, pale with fright, as the man, with a sudden movement, interposed his hulking figure betwixt her and the door. "Ye'll do me the extry favor to stan' right whar you be, tell I get through a-talkin' to ye, Mis' Rossi. My, ain't it a holy mericle though, to think I've got 'Manuel's wife whar he got mine once! He jest killed her, 'Manuel did, an' I ain't the forgittin' kind. They reckoned they'd got me all paid up an' settled with; but 'Rastus Winch ain't so easy-goin' as all that. I swore 'at I'd git even with that little skunk of a beggar 'at took my wife away f'om me, an' say! I am a-goin' to do it now!"

Hilda was almost helpless with fear; her blue eyes shone like stars in her white face. "'Rastus Winch!" she faltered, catching at a straw of hope, "are you 'Rastus Winch?"

"Yes, I be. I see you've heerd of me. That fine husband of yours 'ud be lyin' in a pauper's grave if it had n't ha' been fer me. I brung him up an' done fer him, an' what did I git fer it? The mean little rooster run away, an' my wife she took to her bed an' died along of him; that was the way of it. Yes—an' I ain't never forgot it—not fer a minit. I sez to him las' time I seen him, 'I'll git even with ye,' I sez."

It was evident to the trembling woman who faced him that the man was either drunk or crazy. Did he mean to murder her? She strove to quiet the tremor in her voice as she said, "Won't you—won't you please sit down, Mr. Winch. I've always wanted to see you and thank you for your kindness to Mr. Rossi."

"You lie!" roared Winch, the great veins starting out upon his forehead. "Why did n't ye come an' see me then? I heerd 'at you wuz here, an' me thinks I, mebbe he'll hev the decency to fetch me over a couple of hundreds fer my ol' age. If he had, why, I dunno but I'd ha' let him off. But now, I vow I'm a-goin' to give you the worst lickin' you ever had. I owe him one f'om way back, but I guess it'll smart 'nough if you git it 'stead o' him." He advanced threateningly, brandishing his whip.

Hilda sprang back behind the shelter of a table. "Wait!" she cried, breathlessly. "Let me tell you! He wanted me to go to see you. We were going—we were going to-day—yes, really! I—I have something, something beautiful, for you—just see this!" She essayed with trembling fingers to unfasten the brooch at her throat.

CONSTANT COMPANIONSHIP

Christ's Continual Presence with his Followers a Source of Power

ONE striking characteristic gives to Christianity a power possessed by no other religion. It is the personal and vital connection between the humblest believer and his divine Head. Christ emphasized this fact in many ways, and seemed to seek figures which would show how close and intimate the connection was. With all our theories about Christ, with all our systems of doctrine, with all our explanations of the atonement, the prime, supreme fact dominating every other is the essential truth of the oneness of Christ with his followers. The connection is as close, Christ said, as the connection of the branches with the vine. His life flows into them and without him they can do nothing. He identifies himself with his people, suffers in their suffering, is glorified in them and counts as service rendered to him, any kindness done to them. Even a cup of cold water given to a believer because of his connection with Christ, will be recognized and rewarded. "Why persecutest thou me?" he asked Saul of Tarsus. "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest," he said. Jesus had ascended into heaven and Saul had done nothing against him personally, but those humble people whom Saul was halting to prison, were Christ's representatives, and in them he was being punished. They were members of his body, and as the head suffers when the hand or the foot suffers, so he in them was being humiliated and harassed. How many a tried, distressed Christian has been comforted by this assurance! He is not alone in the world. His life is hid with Christ in God. Christ is with him, always giving him encouragement, patience and strength.

What honor and dignity this aspect of the Christian life confers on the humble believer! The rich and great of this world may despise him; he may be excluded from their society and be splashed with the mud from their carriage wheels; but he is a son of God through the favor of his Lord. Wherever he may be, in his work, in his home, in the lonely hours of the night, in prosperity and in adversity, he has the assurance that Christ is with him, to cheer him and to protect him. It is impossible to conceive of any privilege so high as this, and it is an actual experience enjoyed by multitudes.

Its effect is powerful beyond description. Once fully realized, it purifies the soul, driving out evil thoughts, sweetening and elevating the disposition and inspiring the whole man to noble conduct. We know of no influence so mighty in life as companionship. It is with a shudder and a prevision of coming calamity, that a father sees his child associating with evil companions. Time and again from the prisoners' dock and the scaffold, the declaration has been made that bad associates have been the cause of crime. On the other hand, the companionship of the good has often redeemed the fallen. John Gough used to tell with thrilling pathos how it helped him in his solitary struggle against the demon of intemperance. He felt he must have a drink, he was suffering torture, he could not endure it. Just then a man came in, and, laying his hand on Gough's shoulder, said: "You are having a hard time now, but you are one of us since you signed the pledge, and I believe you will conquer." Gough grasped his hand and said: "Yes, I think I can now." If such help could come from the friendship of a man, what may we not hope for from the realization of the friendship of Christ!

The conditions of such companionship are not hard. There can be no companionship in its true sense, without a similarity of taste and motive and principle. Two cannot walk together unless they are agreed. In our poor, feeble way, we long to be like Christ. This fact is enough for him. He knows our weakness and is aware of all our infirmities. With infinite love and compassion, he accompanies us in our path through life, ready to lift us when we fall, and to guide our steps over the rough places. It is only when we deliberately grieve him by committing sin that he leaves us. When we go into evil places, when we voluntarily seek the company of wicked persons, he turns away sorrowfully, hurt as only so gentle and loving a soul can be hurt by our disloyalty. Loving us with a love that was true to the death, he would lead us ever upward to peace and purity. Ingrate beyond expression shall we be if we put away from us such love for the sake of the husks of worldly pleasure.

The Late President Arnold

"A CHRISTIAN College of Broad Acres" is in mourning. To the readers of THE

THE LATE PRESIDENT ARNOLD

CHRISTIAN HERALD, who will recall the account of the work of McPherson College, Kansas, which appeared in the issue of May 14, it will be a matter of painful interest to learn of the untimely death of its President, Charles Edward Arnold, which occurred May 31. President Arnold had been a strong, healthy man, as his portrait indicates, until a few months ago, when he suddenly began to fail in health. He continued at his post, however, until about four weeks before his death, when he was compelled to seek relief. A surgical operation revealed a malignant form of internal cancer, for which the best medical skill could do nothing. With the same calm, peaceful spirit which characterized his whole life, he awaited the approaching transition.

His early life was spent on a farm in Mineral County, W. Va. His youthful ambition was to become a teacher, perhaps some day in a college. Rainy days and noon hours were spent in study. He received his higher education at Bridgewater College, Va., Ohio Normal University, and Illinois Wesleyan University. He came to McPherson College in 1893 as Professor of Mathematics, and three years later was elected President. At that time the college was deeply in debt and confronted with other difficulties. To his undaunted courage and inspiring leadership is largely due the fact that these difficulties were surmounted. In addition to his duties as President, he occupied the chair of Philosophy and Pedagogy, but he was an indefatigable worker and his interest extended to other lines. He was a zealous promoter of the Sunday School, and at the time of his death was Secretary of the Executive Committee of the Kansas State Sunday School Association. Though but thirty-six years of age, he was already recognized as one of the leading educators of the State. His services were sought for Normal Institutes and convention programmes. He was an able preacher, lecturer and writer; a man of large plans, high ideals and tireless energy. He was a thorough Christian. Until within a few days before his death he continued at his work, dictating answers to correspondence, and directing the conduct of affairs.

President Arnold's spirit will live in the lives of the students who sat at his feet, and of his co-workers, who must honor his name by pushing on to still greater success the cause to which he gave his life.

McPherson, Kan. EDWARD FRANTZ.

SATISFIED

THE trial fires may glow,
But Jesus loves me so,
I am content.
Oh bliss serene and deep,
May I this jewel keep,
Till life is spent.

No earthly joys are mine,
Yet in my heart doth shine
The star of love,
Guiding my weary feet,
Making my pathway sweet
To heaven above.

I am content to wait,
Until at heaven's gate
He bids me rest.
Happy at last and free,
Joy, peace and liberty
On Jesus' breast.

Christ's Prophecies

The Order of Events Deduced from our Lord's Eschatological Discourses

ABOVE every consideration, it is important to see that our Lord was speaking through his four apostles to the rest of his apostles, and through them to the whole body of his followers, down to the end of this age. Some have assumed that Jesus was speaking through the apostles only to the elect remnant of Israel after the Church is taken up. The objections to this view are very strong. 1. It cannot be denied that the first few verses of this discourse were fulfilled before the destruction of Jerusalem, when the only believing Jews were Christians—members of the Body of Christ. 2. In Luke's record, he goes right on from the days when Jerusalem is compassed with armies to the days when signs appear in the heavens. There is no distinction between the "ye" that flee when the armies surround the Holy City and the "ye" who see the signs in the heavens. 3. The apostles at that time, were believers and were saved men, even although some might deny that they were members of the Church of God. They certainly were the nucleus out of which the Church grew. But the "remnant" will not be believers in the true Messiah, although they will suffer because they reject the false Messiah of that day. 4. If this part of the discourse were intended for the "remnant" in that coming day, it would be useless to them, for they would not believe it or even read it. 5. If this instruction on Olivet outside of Jerusalem is not for the Church, then how can we accept as Church truth the discourses of John, from the thirteenth to the seventeenth chapters, which were given two days afterward to the same apostles within Jerusalem? No! Jesus was addressing the whole body of believers down to "the end of the age"—the horizon everywhere seen in the latter part of Matthew.

On this account, the corporate "ye" and "you" are used all through this discourse. He is addressing a continuously-existing, self-perpetuating, corporate body, not to pass away. Individuals composing the body of the Church might die and disappear, but the Church, the "ye" and "you," lives on. Its corporate and historic unity and perpetuity are indestructible. The continuous existence of a corporate entity is entirely independent of the presence or absence of the individual units of whom it was composed at the beginning. Its corporate identity is not affected by circumstantial variations. The Jewish generation that rejected the Lord is a still existing one, nor will it pass away until succeeded by that other generation that shall "know the Lord from the least to the greatest." Hence our Lord says to the Jews who rejected him, "Ye shall not see me until ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." So fully did he recognize the corporate unity or identity of that rejecting body of men, to whom he bade a solemn farewell within the precincts of the temple, with another body of the same race, down through many centuries, that this other body, at some future time, will surely say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Nothing is more demonstrable than this. Nearly two thousand years have passed and yet the Jews have not said, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." When the Jews do give him welcome, it will be the same corporate body as that which rejected and crucified him, and sent a message that they would not have this man to reign over them.

But another body is addressed in chapter twenty-four, which is as different from the one addressed in the twenty-third chapter as blessing is different from cursing. One is the representative of hardened and unbelieving Israel, and the other, of the disciples of the Lord. This body was to be composed of those who were to walk in the light, to be the channels of blessings and the witnesses of grace; while the others, in chapter twenty-three, would remain in unbelief and grope on in darkness to the end of Gentile days. Each body has already existed during a period of nearly two thousand years.

When the Lord left the city, the temple and the people of Israel, on the Mount of Olives, his disciples came unto him. Here he was addressing quite another and different corporate body, and to them he says, "When ye see," although he knew right well that not one of those individuals who were then present would ever see the things of which he speaks. He spoke in the fulness of the future. He spoke to and through the charter members of a corporate unit to the entire, continuous entity of that corporation—that is, to the whole body of future believers.

Whole wheat is a Naturally Organized Food, that is, contains all the properties in Correct Proportion necessary for the Complete Nourishment of Man. "Soft Cooked" cereals are swallowed with little or no mastication and, therefore, the teeth are robbed of their necessary—natural—exercise, causing weakness and decay. A Word from His Son

The Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage, the talented son of his illustrious father, speaking of this work in the Introduction, written by himself, says:

My father's influence was cumulative. He did not spring into sight suddenly as a meteor. His life influence was like the rising sun. His twilight was even more glorious than his mid-noon. His mind was always reaching out to investigate new fields of knowledge. The arrow of death felled him when he was preaching in the far-off capital of Mexico. Hundreds of his sermons have been published and are preserved for the reader in permanent form. This biography is the only book which has been written up to date, by men who were conversant with the inner thoughts and writings of Dr. Talmage's life.

BOER BOY CAPTIVES AT WELLINGTON

Joy Among the Boer Exiles

IT is doubtful whether the news of the return of peace to South Africa aroused as deep and fervent a thrill of joy in England or the Transvaal as it did in the lonely camps of the exiled Boers in India, Ceylon, and elsewhere. To them the news meant release from captivity and restoration to their homes and kindred. In the great Boer Camp at Wellington, near Coonoor, a cool and healthful place in the Nilgiri Hills, India, where 700 Transvaalers and Free Staters have been living under canvas for many months, the news was a most delightful surprise.

From the Rev. G. N. Thomssen, a well-known American missionary in India. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a number of very interesting photographic views of the Wellington Camp, taken just before it was broken up, for the purpose of sending the exiles back to South Africa. These photographs afford a glimpse of the daily life of the exiles. They were supplied with the regular British Army ration, and did their own cooking. Though "under escort"—a military camp being near at hand—they were not restricted as to their general movements, and enjoyed the most absolute freedom within their own camp lines. They were housed and cared for as "parolers," rather than as prisoners. Their Predikant (or pastor), a fine, manly, well-educated clergyman, said to Dr. Thomssen: "I have just written to my elder in Ahmednagar that we are all prisoners, but with this difference, they (the Boers at Ahmednagar) are hedged about with barbed wire, while we are hedged about with our word of honor!"

Dr. Thomssen, while at the Camp, preached to the Boers. He writes: "It was a fine congregation of bearded men, young stalwart athletes and brawny boys, all bowing in deepest reverence to worship the Father, who is leading them, as they say, even through this dark valley. There are no benches, no chairs. Some have made for themselves light portable field stools; the others are on the ground. How their hymns, especially the psalms, thrill one as they sing! The worship has all the simplicity and downright earnestness of the Huguenots and Scotch Covenanters of former times, when they met for the worship of God in their mountain homes."

None of the men were idle in the Wellington Camp.

Some carved in bone, others in wood; some made picture-frames—all found something to do, in addition to the usual domestic avocations. Very few were sick. All, however, had the universal longing for peace, and the inquiry upon every lip was ever: "When are we going home?" Now, happily, the wish has been gratified.

Liebenbergh, who was one of the prisoners. He had a church and eight hundred members, about eighty miles from Pretoria, before the war. There were found to be many men of prayer and godly lives among the Boers. Mr. Ward, writing on the subject, said: "Little bands of them go off daily, and even oftener, into the mountain solitudes, which must remind them so much of their own native 'veldts.' Many pleaded with God for a special manifestation of Pentecostal power, and he graciously and signally answered their prayers. They also pleaded with tears for the return of peace in their native land. . . . The conviction of sin in many cases has been very deep. Night after night souls have been brought to the Lord, some of them crying and weeping under a sense of sin." These meetings have been held in the open air, at evening, in the bright moonlight. Between 500 and 600 men gathered in a hollow, and with the aid of a harmonium, sang well-known hymns—a Dutch version of 'Lord, I hear of showers of blessing' being the favorite. The chorus of another, which became very popular with them, was as follows:

Jesus knows all about our troubles,
He will guide till the day is done,
There is not a friend like the lowly Jesus,
No not one—no not one.

Pastor Liebenbergh usually opened the services with a prayer in Dutch. Then came the addresses in English, which the good pastor translated into Dutch, speaking in a forcible and impressive manner. As the regular meetings closed, groups of inquirers remained behind, and many made confession of Christ. Gospel meetings were also held at Kaity, a higher location, to which about 150 Boers were removed early in May, and at these also, the Divine power was made strikingly manifest. There have been conversions in the Ceylon Boer camp also, and eighty men have pledged themselves for missionary service. Some of these will probably remain to work for Christ among the heathen. Altogether, the religious revival among the prisoners, who are now setting their faces toward home and freedom once more, was a remarkable one, and productive of spiritual results that cannot fail to influence the surroundings of these men, when they are again settled in their native land.

A RELIGIOUS SERVICE IN THE GREAT BOER CAMP AT WELLINGTON, INDIA

In April and May, a series of Gospel meetings was held in the Boer camp at Wellington, being conducted by Messrs. Mallis and Ward, well-known mission workers, with the assistance of the Boer pastor, Mr.

The Garnered Wheat

TEXT — PSALM 126: 6:

"He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him"

ALMOST every home is adorned with companion pictures. If upon one side of the room there is hung a Crucifixion scene, upon the other side of the room we want a picture of "The First Easter Morn." If upon one side we see the wayward boy, gathering all together and taking his journey into a far country, upon the other side we want to see the returning prodigal being welcomed home by a forgiving father. If upon one side of the room we hang a picture of the Twilight, upon the other side we want to see the picture of the "Dawn." If John Hevenden paints "The Breaking of the Home Ties," he feels that his life would be incomplete, unless he also paints "The Bringing Home of the Bride." John Milton's Paradise Regained, is a natural outgrowth of his Paradise Lost. Dante's Heaven, is a natural sequence to his Purgatory and his Hell.

So, this morning, the sermon which I preach from the One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Psalm of David, is a companion sermon to the one recently delivered upon the text, "He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." It has a companion text chosen on account of its vivid contrast. The text is selected to prove that the Christian sower has a right to expect his Gospel harvest fields to be stacked high with golden sheaves of many blessings—to expect his seed to bring forth some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundredfold. It is the picture of a Christian worker garnering the sheaves of his Christ-love. It is the symbol of reward, the symbol of glorified hope and joy. It is the sweeter text, because in it we hear the triumphant songs of heaven, instead of the bitter sobs of despair.

The Joy of Rescue

A precious sheaf, garnered by the Christian sower and reaper, is the joyful realization that by his personal acts he has been made the human means in the Divine hands through which immortal souls have been saved by Christ. There is a natural desire in-born in almost every human heart, to help those who are in trouble and who cannot help themselves. If, at the summer seashore, a bather is taken with a cramp, and begins to sink and calls for help, all up and down the beach runs the cry "There is a man drowning! Look! Look! Cannot somebody do something to save him?" Then the women weep and wring their hands. Then the men run out the lifeboat, and stout arms pull at the oars. Or if there is no boat near, four or five strong swimmers will dash into the surf, and with powerful stroke they will battle against the waves. Then they drag the unconscious bather in. Friendly hands will roll him upon a barrel. Then the doctors will work over him and the word will be passed around "Stand back, and give him air." And when at last the sufferer opens his eyes and begins to breathe regularly, this sentiment will be heard everywhere: "Thank God, he is saved! He will live. He will live!" Then when the people crowd about the rescuers to congratulate them, and ask them if they were hurt, the brave fellows may answer, "Well, we are pretty well used up and exhausted, but it does not matter much as long as we saved him—as long as we saved him."

If the lookout sights a shipwrecked vessel, the captain does not have to compel unwilling sailors to lower the lifeboat and pull away to save the perishing. No, all that the mate has to do is to call for volunteers; and though the sailors may feel the waves are having their worst fit of temper, they will lower the lifeboat and pull away, until the last man is taken from the doomed ship. When the little band of English men, women and children were imprisoned during the Indian Mutiny, in the residency of Lucknow, Havelock with his few regiments had to fight his way through a hundred thousand men. He had to march a thousand miles through a country swarming with cutthroats. And when the English soldiers' courage and strength showed signs of wavering, Havelock roused them with this simple sentence: "Men, would you dare stop or turn back, when helpless women and children are dying and must be saved?" There is, in almost every man's heart, a desire to help those who cannot help themselves. The same kind of a desire that drove Henry M. Stanley into the Dark Continent to rescue David Livingstone and Emin Pasha. The same kind of a desire which made Commander Schley turn his ships' prow northward to rescue the Arctic explorer Greely and his companions. It is the same kind of desire which inspired the United States Government to declare war against Spain in behalf of suffering and bleeding Cuba.

Now, as joy is nothing more nor less than the pleasant emotion produced in the heart by the gratification of any desire, as we have shown, in reference to the physical man, that the desire to help those who are helpless is implanted in almost every heart, what greater joy could come to the Christian reaper than the realization that he has been made instrumental in the saving of a soul. What earthly joy can be compared to the holy exaltation that comes to us when we realize that, by prayers and pleadings, we have been able to bring a sinner face to face with Christ? What greater joy than to realize that our humble efforts have been blessed to the saving of a soul which will live on and on through the coming ages, on and on through eternities, on and on until at last the lights of the stars shall be snuffed out and time shall be no longer? Only the other day, I read of a man, who, at great personal risk to himself, was lowered by a rope from the top of a twelve-story building, in order to rescue a little kitten which had fallen into one of the rain gutters. If a man could find joy in risking his life to save a kitten from starvation, surely there must be infinite joy to the Christian's heart when he realizes that not one but many immortal souls have been won to Christ, and to eternal safety and happiness, through his efforts, which God has so richly blessed.

A Passion for Souls

So, on account of this transcendent joy, we find that soul-saving has become a passion with some men. Just as the mechanic's wife, who has a little back-yard, digs and plants and hoes and hovers over her garden, because she loves flowers, and never tires of her beds filled with pansies, and sweet peas, and geraniums, and narcissus, and nasturtiums, so the true Christian loves men and women in order to win them to Christ. The city missionary goes down into the back alley for this one purpose. He climbs the dark tenement. There he finds a drunken husband and father. And as the city missionary looks upon that loathsome, filthy mass of human corruption, he says to himself, "If I can only plant the Gospel seed in that man's heart, it may save him. Yes, by the help of God, it will save him." And, as the mechanic's wife cares for her flowers, so that missionary cares for that soul diseased by sin. He prays with the sinner. He reads the Bible to him. After a while, the man confesses Christ and signs the temperance pledge. Then the city missionary helps this man, who was once enslaved by sin, to find work. Then he sees him bring his wages home. He sees him buy shoes for his children's feet and food for the table. Then he sees those children sent to the day schools and gathered into the Sunday Schools. Then, after a while, the city missionary sees the father, with his wife and children, all standing before the Mercy Seat and joining the church. And as the missionary's eyes fill with tears, he says, "He is saved!" By the power of the Holy Spirit, not only one soul, but a whole family of immortal souls are saved. Ah, there is no joy on earth like the rapturous joy of soul saving. It is one of the most precious sheaves ever garnered by the Christian worker. My brother, if you have not this passion for saving souls, you have not yet been blessed with the holiest joy of which the human heart can conceive.

A Far-Sighted Statesman

Another precious sheaf that is garnered by the Christian reaper, is the gratitude of those whose immortal souls he has been able, by the power of the Holy Spirit, to win to Christ. No true Christian has a right to swerve one inch from the path of rectitude, in order to win the approbation of his fellow men. He should be willing to do his full duty under all conditions. No matter what obstacles may confront him, he should be willing to draw the plumb-line of principle, and go straight ahead, whether he is praised or blamed, loved or hated, honored or despised. He should be as true to his God as Robert R. Livingston was true to his country's best interests, when, as Minister to France, he negotiated the Louisiana purchase, which gave to the United States Government all the land lying between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean. When he negotiated that purchase, in the face of a storm of domestic opposition, Robert R. Livingston knew he was signing his own political death-warrant.

But when a Christian worker can sow the good seed, and not only gather for Christ a harvest of immortal souls, but gather also the gratitude and love of those whom he has been able, by the power of the Holy Ghost, to lead to salvation, the reward of that love is very sweet. It is as sweet as the affection which Mr. D. L. Moody used to shower upon a little old woman, popularly called Mother Cook, whose prayers were the means of giving to Mr. Moody a spirit-filled life—a little old woman whom perhaps you have never heard of; yet a woman whom the whole Christian world ought to love on account of the work she has done. It is as sweet as the affection which a Sunday School scholar gives to his teacher, because that teacher has led him to Christ. It is as sweet as the look of gratitude which the dying man turns upon one who has pointed him to the Cross and to Divine pardon. It is as sweet as the affection which a child showers upon a mother's life, an affection which is developed not alone from the temporal care which she devotes to the child, but also from the spiritual care, whereby she has been able to put her child's hand into the hand of a loving Christ.

The Sensitive Opal

Like the sensitive opal when it comes into contact with the living hand, the heart of the believer is made to glow when it feels the warm love and gratitude of those whom it has led into the spiritual newness of life. The story is told that a celebrated New York jeweler purchased in Europe a magnificent collection of gems. When he returned home, he arranged these stones in a cabinet, and invited some of his closest friends to inspect them. When his friends entered the room, he pointed to the cabinet and said, "There, gentlemen, is the richest collection of gems, I believe, in all this land. There is nothing like it in value anywhere." The friends were in raptures over the sight. In the cabinet were pearls and amethysts and diamonds and rare stones of all sorts. It seemed as though the richest treasures of the noted Peacock Throne of India, which was worth over $60,000,000, had been selected for this collection. But in the midst of all these beautiful jewels was one which looked like an unsightly pebble. "Why do you place such a dull, hideous-looking, pebble-like stone as that among those costly gems?" asked one of the visitors. The host answered not a word. He unlocked the cabinet, took out the pebble-like stone, and held it in the palm of his closed hand. Just as the guests were about to leave, the host said, "Let me show you the richest and rarest stone of all my treasures." He opened his hand, and there, upon the palm, was a stone which glowed like a live coal. It was such a brilliant stone that every guest uttered an exclamation of surprise. "Where did you get it?" they cried. "We have never seen the like of it before." "That stone is the rarest I have," answered the jeweler. "That is the unsightly pebble you saw a few moments ago in the cabinet. That is a sensitive opal, which has been warmed into what looks like a live coal by the heat of my blood."

A Harvest of Gratitude

The true Christian sower ought to be ready to sow the good seed under all conditions, no matter whether he be praised or blamed, honored or despised. But when he does begin to gather his harvests, he will not only reap the sheaf of joy which comes from the realization that he has won some soul, but he will also reap the gratitude and the love of those who were brought to Christ through his instrumentality. This love and gratitude will transform the jewel of his heart into a glowing gem, aflame with life, which shall glow like the richest jewel that ever flashed in the crown of a king.

Another precious sheaf which is garnered by the Christian reaper is the sheaf of contentment—the willingness to live happily in that field of life in which he has been placed by God. If a man does not mingle with the poor and the troubled, the sick and the suffering, he never fully realizes how good and kind and loving God has been to him. If a man does not visit the sick room and try to carry there comfort and good cheer to the wan invalid, he never fully appreciates the blessings of health, unless, perhaps, he himself has been carried into a hospital. Then, while recovering from a serious sickness, he has seen intense sufferings and agonies such as may be witnessed in almost every ward of a large hospital. If a man has never entered a home where diphtheria has played havoc with the nursery, or where consumption has made the young mother cough her life away, he never fully appreciates the blessings of having his children and wife by his side. If a man has not tried to carry the Gospel to the outcasts and the vile, he has never yet realized the blessing of being born in a Christian cradle and surrounded by a Christian childhood. Ah, the Christian sower who scatters the good seed upon the troubled sea of restless humanity, while he may be carrying a blessing to others, he is also planting in his own heart the seeds of gratitude to God, and of contentment with his own sphere of life.

My brother, you are unhappy. Will you let me end your despondency? Well, then, go first and buy a few flowers at the nearest florist's. "Oh!" you answer, "I cannot afford to buy any flowers." Yes, you can, my brother. You can buy all the flowers I want for the money you would spend upon cigars during the next week. Then I want you to go with me for a pastoral call into the young man's room, who broke down physically and who is going to die. Do you know what is the matter with him? He broke down from overwork. His life's desire was to enter the Christian ministry. He used to clerk during the day and send most of his money home, to help support his father's family. Then he used to study at night. His clothing was very poor. His food was poor. And yet if you will go into that sick-room, and carry those flowers, you will find tears of joy coming into his grateful eyes. You will hear him say that though the greatest ambition of his life was to preach the Gospel, yet God knows best! Then he will plead with you to take his place. My brother, you had a father to send you through college. You had kind friends to help. You have everything for which to be thankful to God. Yet the greatest lesson of contentment you will ever learn is when you cast those few flowers into the grateful fountain of that dying boy's tears.

The Sheaf of Contentment

My sister, you are fretting on account of the children. You say it keeps your needle going night and day to put dresses upon the girls. You complain that the boys never seem to care whether or no they wear holes in the knees of their stockings and pants. Sister, I want you to make up a lunch basket. You need not fix up a bundle of little dresses. They will not be needed now. But as you take that lunch basket, filled with delicacies, I will lead you to a home where a young mother has just lost her baby. That baby was an idiot. He had water upon the brain. Yet, as you go into the sick room of the weak mother, you will hear her say: "Oh, Mr. Talmage, I did love him so much. The doctors said he never would be bright. But he was all I had. I did love my baby so much." And after you have gone there with me, you will stop your complaining and fault-finding, and return to your home and love your little ones as you have never loved them before. Yes, one of the most precious sheaves the Gospel reaper ever garners, is the sheaf of contentment, the sheaf of gratitude to God for his many, many blessings.

Another precious sheaf which is garnered by the Christian sower, is the joyful realization that the results of his seed planting will never die, as long as the world lasts. As we have before said, one seed properly planted will produce many seeds. Those seeds which are produced by the one seed, in turn will produce many other seeds. And these, in their turn, will produce many seeds more. So a Christian's earthly influence does not cease at the grave, but will multiply for good as long as the world lasts. It will go on increasing until the seas have been licked up and the mountains and the valleys have been cremated in the last conflagration.

Dr. Louis A. Banks tells how Rev. Dr. Valpy wrote four simple lines for his confession of faith. They went thus:

In peace let me resign my breath
And Thy salvation see;
My sins deserve eternal death—
But Jesus died for me.

Dr. Valpy gave a copy of those lines to Dr. Marsh, the Rector of Beckenham, who had them placed over his study desk. The Earl of Roden was visiting Dr. Marsh one day, and asked him for a copy. A short time after this General Taylor, a hero of Waterloo, was visiting the Earl of Roden, and he took a copy of those lines and was by them led to Christ. General Taylor in turn gave a copy of those lines to a soldier friend of his, and he also was converted. Thus the good seed which Dr. Valpy sowed many years ago, has kept on through generation after generation, multiplying for good a hundredfold. And to-day, perhaps, by my repeating those lines, some one here may be converted by them.

An Endless Chain

My father once told of a chain of influence more wonderful to hear even than the story of Dr. Valpy, as showing the results of Gospel seed-planting. He started with a poor woman giving a simple gospel tract to a passer-by. That tract brought this young man to Christ. This young man wrote a book. That book was blessed of the Holy Spirit, and brought thousands upon thousands into the Kingdom, among others Richard Baxter, who wrote Saints' Rest. That book in turn brought thousands upon thousands into the Kingdom of God. Among other converts were this man, that man and the other man who, in turn, all wrote books which had blessed results. So there was developed a harvest of thousands of souls, all the direct results of one simple seed-planting, the result of one poor unknown woman giving a gospel tract to a young man who was passing by. So the results of the good seed which the Gospel sower sows, will never die as long as this old world lasts.

But the most precious sheaf garnered by the Christian sower and reaper is the joyful realization that all the harvests which result from all the different Christian plantings shall be gathered at last into the granaries of heaven. It matters not how many immortal men and women and children may be saved, nor whether they are rich or poor, black or white, Jew or Gentile, Protestant or Catholic, they shall all find room for themselves in heaven. All who will accept Christ, and throw themselves upon his pardon and love, can come. The sower of the Gospel seed might hesitate to cast the Bread of Life upon the troubled sea of sin, if he thought the Gospel invitation was to be in any way circumscribed. But it is not. The invitation is so wide that it takes in all who are ready to be cleansed of sin. The invitation is so wide that the welcome comes from every direction. "The Spirit and the bride say come. And let him that heareth say come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." That surely is a broad enough invitation for all.

And what a harvest home that will be, when all the Gospel sheaves shall be gathered into the granaries of heaven. The rejoicing will be everywhere. Some of us have seen the noted picture of the painter Seifert, called "The Harvesters' Return." We have seen there the joyful looks upon the faces of the men and the women who have been working in the fields. Perhaps we ourselves have lived in the country. We have shared in the joy of the laborers when the last sheaf of wheat has been taken to the threshing-floors. But the joy of the earthly harvest home is as nothing compared to the heavenly joy when all the Gospel sheaves shall be gathered into the heavenly granaries. Fathers and mothers and children, they will all be there. Brothers and sisters, they shall be there. Husbands and wives, friends and loved ones, they shall be there. From the north, the east, the south and the west of the heavenly lands will be heard the cry: "Harvest Home, Harvest Home, Harvest Home! This is the eternal Harvest Home!"

Sad to his toil he goes,
His seed with weeping leaves,
But he shall come at twilight's close,
And bring his golden sheaves.

Now, as the Gospel sower, who casts his bread upon the waters, shall reap such glorious harvests, shall we not redouble our energies and plant as many good seeds as we can for Christ? Shall we not do as much good as we can, in the few years that remain for us? Shall we not thank God that he has given to us an opportunity to work and to live for him? Shall we not find our joy and reward in sowing, and in scattering our Gospel seed over the field of sin, in scattering our good deeds over the great troubled sea of humanity?

Finding a Patrimony

To show what rewards can come from casting the seeds abroad, the story is told that in the far East, a father lay dying. He called to his bedside his five boys, and told them that he had nothing to leave them but his farm. But that in the fields of that farm was buried a very rich treasure, and if they wanted to become rich, they should go and dig the fields until they found it. So, after the father was buried, the five boys took their spades and picks and ploughs and went to work. They dug the fields up far and near. They dug them very deep. They dug them over and over again, but they could not find the treasure. As they had dug the fields so deep, the boys decided to plant them. Then, when the harvests came and were gathered and sold, and the money filled the family treasury, the boys began to think. They said to themselves: "Perhaps, after all, the rich treasure which our father had promised us has been dug up by our spades and ploughs." Their treasure came not in the gold quarried from a dark mine, but in the minted gold of a wheat sheaf. So Christ, like the dying father, bids us find our Gospel treasures by casting the good seed into the ground, by scattering it upon the sea of sinful humanity. Then we shall reap the golden harvests which shall be garnered in the granaries of heaven.

Would that we all might be willing to go forth to this Gospel planting. Would that we all might get our hearts in touch with Christ, so that we might consecrate our lives for the mighty work of spreading the Gospel, and for gathering in a harvest of never-dying souls. This is no idle hope I offer to you. The Sacred Word emphatically says that if any Christian sower goeth forth bearing precious seed, he shall come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him at the earthly and heavenly Harvest Home.

PRINCETON'S NEW PRESIDENT ✱

Dr. Woodrow Wilson, Elected President of the Historic Institution, in Succession to Dr. Patton

THE CAMPUS OF PRINCETON UNIVERSITY—DR. WOODROW WILSON, THE NEW PRESIDENT

GENERAL surprise was occasioned at the announcement, at the recent commencement of Princeton University, of the resignation by Dr. Francis L. Patton, of the Presidency of that institution. So brilliant and successful has his administration been, that it is difficult to understand his reason for terminating it. It could not have been on account of his age, for he has not yet reached his sixtieth year, while his illustrious predecessor, Dr. McCosh, remained an efficient president at the age of seventy-seven. It may be that his well-known preference for the life of a student to that of an administrator has weighed with him. In that case, there is reason to hope that the reading public may profit by Princeton's loss. He will continue his work with the University as Professor of Ethics, and also retain his chair in the Seminary.

Dr. Woodrow Wilson, who, at Dr. Patton's suggestion, was elected as his successor, has been for some years Professor of Jurisprudence in the University. It is the first time in its history that Princeton has had a layman as its President. He is forty-six years of age, a graduate of Princeton, and at one time a professor in Wesleyan University. He is popular with the students, and is said to be a man of ripe scholarship and of marked executive ability. His father having been a Presbyterian minister, Princeton cannot be considered to have altogether broken with its traditions in electing him. It is gratifying also to learn from his own lips that he does not contemplate any revolutionary changes in the methods of the University, but hopes to develop its usefulness on the broad lines already laid down. It is possible, however, that under Dr. Wilson's administration the elective system may be extended on the lines adopted at Harvard and that changes may gradually be made, which will render Princeton less of a theological institution and more of a secular school of learning.

The Perfect of Live is Love

The Ten Commandments
Duties to Man

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 20
EXODUS 20: 12-17

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- MATT. 19: 19:
"THOU SHALT LOVE THY NEIGHBOR AS THYSELF"

THE Ten Commandments are a revelation of love only second to the Cross itself. They are ten signboards pointing out the way to happiness and heaven, that we may not lose our way and stray into bypaths of sin, which are also ways of sorrow. We have all some time left the right way, and the Cross is the gateway by which we return and the place where we get divine strength to go forward.

When a loving father gives a child orders not to do this or that, it is a very young or very foolish child who thinks the orders are merely arbitrary commands, to assert parental authority or needlessly interfere with his pleasure. Every sensible child knows a good parents' commands are intended for his good always. Much more is this true of God's commands, which are based on perfect knowledge as well as perfect love.

How gentle God's commands,
How kind his precepts are;
Come, cast thy burden on the Lord
And trust his constant care.

Bishop Whipple, so long the friend and champion of the Indian, was once visited by a savage chief, who asked that a missionary be sent to his tribe. He said to the bishop, "I want your religion for my people. You are patient and you make the trail plain." The mission was planted and the chief himself learned to follow the Christian "trail." The Ten Commandments have "blazed the way" so plainly that the youngest and most ignorant need not miss it, if only he carries also the compass of love to God and man which ever points the same way. God's "Thou shalt not" are the rays of a lighthouse that warns us off the rocks that would wreck our lives. Too much has been said in seeming disparagement of the law in contrast to the Gospel, and of law in contrast to love. We need to repeat again and again the words of Browning, which he learned of Moses and of Christ:

All's love yet all's law.

Then we shall have even greater enthusiasm than the naturalist feels in discovering the laws of nature, in considering the higher, perfect moral law, which embodies not only perfect wisdom but perfect love. Moses, the lawgiver, was transfigured in receiving the law, and was again called to share in Christ's transfiguration. Our thought of God's law will be transfigured from dread to delight, as it was in the soul of the unknown writer of the 119th Psalm, when we come to realize that the commandments are like the loving arrows with which Jonathan warned David, that he might escape the perils about him.

OBEY YOUR PARENTS.
YOUR RULERS.
YOUR GOD.

For example, how many heartbreaks children would save themselves if they obeyed God by obeying their parents! A prison warden at Sing Sing, where the words over the entrance are, "The way of transgressors is hard," said to the writer, "These men are here because they did not learn obedience at home." The home is God's school of obedience, where we learn by obeying our parents to obey our rulers and obey our God. A beautiful story is told of a father and daughter out in a boat on a dangerous coast, overtaken near nightfall by a storm. The mother at the seaside home realized their danger, and lighted a lamp to put in the attic window. "It won't do any good," said her son, but she put it there and prayed beside it. The father saw this light on the shore, not knowing whose it was. He pulled the oars with new hope, saying to his daughter who was at the helm, "Steer for that." And so they reached home safely, steering by mother's light. Ah! many a daughter would have been saved from wreck if all through life she had steered by mother's light and life. That son who thought the light would do no good, had himself been wayward, but that night he turned about, by God's help, and determined to steer by mother's light. Months afterwards when disease brought death near, he said to weeping friends, "Do not fear; I shall make the harbor, for I am steering by mother's light."

Thou shalt do no murder. This command does not forbid all killing, but only intentional destruction of human life, including, as Jesus taught, the hatred that would kill another if it dared. But the growth of the humane spirit, through the influence of Christianity, is inclining an increasing number to avoid needless killing, even in hunting, and all needless pain to living creatures, even the lowliest. In no previous age could such a paper as Life, of New York, have published such a fable as the following for Anglo-Saxon readers: "Now," said the Big Buck Deer to his eldest born, "I will show you a sight that I am so proud of that I feel like walking around on my hind legs all the rest of my life."

"Why," said the fawn, "it is a man, as I live."

"Yes," said the fawn's proud parent, dragging out the carcass from behind a tree, "and now, like a good little deer, run and get me my sharpest knife, while I skin him and prepare his head for a dining room ornament. And shall I tell you how your papa did such a brave deed? Then listen, my son. This morning, in company with my faithful bloodhounds, I tracked the man through the forest, drove him into the lake, having first ascertained that he was unarmed, and then, as he was swimming about almost exhausted, I put forth in my canoe and shot him at leisure in a vital spot where it wouldn't show."

Moral: "But, papa," said the fawn, "the man had no chance at all against your skill and science. I don't see anything brave to be proud of."

"But you will," said the Big Buck Deer, "when you get to be as big as I am."

Lincoln was one of the most humane of men, as many an incident shows. One day he was missed from a horseback party with which he was riding. "Where is Lincoln?" said one. "Oh," said another, "when I saw him last he had caught two young birds, which the wind had blown out of their nest, and he was hunting for the nest to put them back." After a while Lincoln rejoined the party, having found the nest and replaced the nestlings. The others laughed, but Lincoln said: "I could not have slept if I had not restored those little birds to their mother."

A beautiful instance of love to man, even to murderers, is told in a British missionary magazine. In 1839 John Williams, a missionary, had been murdered by cannibals in the island of Erromanga. A few years later in Aitutaka, of the Hervey Islands, a native Christian was sending a missionary box to the New Hebrides, with something written on every gift. In trust of property. Borrowing money or incurring debt without good reason to believe it can be paid is one of the meanest, as it is also one of the commonest, forms of stealing. Overcharging for goods or underpaying in wages are also theft. Jesus rendered the eighth command broadly—"Defraud not." Many who would not defraud a neighbor will defraud the government or any corporation. It was recently reported that a preacher's comment on Rom. 12: 1, that a Christian should not evade his dog tax, caused twenty of his congregation to pay such a tax the next day. He who cheats anybody, cheats himself most of all. A boy who had learned the came to the door of a lady's house selling berries. He had no boxes or measure, and so she took his basket to measure out a quart. "Why don't you come in and see that I measure your berries right?" the lady said, as he waited whistling outside. "I'm not afraid," said the boy, "for you would get the worst of it." "Get the worst of it," she replied. "What do you mean by that?" "Why," said the boy, "I should only lose the berries, and you would make yourself a thief. Don't you think that would be getting the worst of it?"

"KEEP OFF THE ROCKS"

Thou shalt not bear false witness.—This forbids all evil speaking. Over and over again we need to be reminded to put every evil word we hear of others through three sieves before repeating it: Is it true? Is it kind? Is it necessary? An old lady, who was never known to speak an unkind word of any one, was exhorting her grandchildren, when one of the said: "But, grandma, dear, you could never say a good word about the devil." The old lady thought a minute and replied: "If we were only half as industrious as he, it would be well for us."

In our anxiety to avoid evil speaking, we must not fall into the other extreme of flattery, and cowardly withholding of deserved rebuke.

It was Paul who said, "Reprove, rebuke, with a long suffering."

Thou shalt not covet.—We are commanded to "covet earnestly the best gifts," that is, to earnestly desire and strive to repeat in our own lives the best things we see in others; but we are not to desire what is another's when our getting it means his losing it. "Covetousness is idolatry." In that saying the extremes of the Decalogue are joined. Indeed covetousness in the three forms of greed and lust and appetite is the threefold root of all the evils forbidden in the other commands. It is the wrong desire in which every wrong deed begins, and so in order to keep the commandments, we must have the natural desire of our hearts displaced through conversion by love to God and man which is "the fulfilling of the law," even as covetousness was the breaking of it.

The design at the foot of this column presents vividly the effect of Sunday observance on the body. Where the Lord's Day is not observed, there is a uniform tendency downward. But when it is observed, the man recovers his vitality, and each succeeding rest day gives new vigor. Each downward line represents a day's work, and each upward line a night's rest. At the end of the first week, there are two courses: one them is for another day's work, and the other represented the continuation of the upward line of rest.

Now that we have studied "the Ten Commandments," it is important to remember that they are not all the commandments in the Bible. The story will bear repetition of the Scotch Presbyterian Session, where the pastor asked a candidate for membership, "How many commandments are there?" and got the answer, "Eleven." The pastor looked with amazement at his elders, and said, "I am ashamed the a hat the missionary found these words: "For the man who murdered Williams." He had learned of Jesus, who prayed for his murderers, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."

Thou shalt not commit adultery. This command forbids all uncleanness of deed and word and thought. In this day of conventions about almost everything else, it is surprising there are not great mass meetings of fathers and mothers in every city, to take united action to protect the children against the foul periodicals and books and pictures displayed so freely in defiance of law, especially the mutascopes and bill posters, which the Mayor could control, and would, if parents generally demanded it; and he could, by a word also, compel decency in the theatres. Only a very small part of what needs to be done to protect children against impurity can be accomplished by mere exhortation in the pulpit and the home. The streets are full of traps for the young that even one earnest individual, with the law for his hammer, might smash, and that, too, by only reading the law quietly to the offending traffickers, and, if necessary, to their landlords; and if these fail to act, to public officers. The writer cleaned out the bandit libraries and obscene literature from fifty-one news rooms in Pittsburgh recently—practically all—without even a battle of words and with no arrest but "the arrest of thought." Similar victories, by the same quiet, personal methods, have been won elsewhere in battles against mutascopes, bill boards, theatres, gambling slot machines. Best of all for the protection of the children against impurity is the curfew.

Thou shalt not steal. Only "a fair exchange is no robbery." There are only two honest ways to get property: one is by gift from one who has a right to give, and the other is by earning it, by rendering an equivalent in goods or services. Gambling, in all its forms, is stealing, because there is no fair exchange; because, also, it is trifling with the sacred should be any one in this parish that does not know there are only ten commandments." But the candidate quietly said, "A new commandment give I unto you that ye love one another." Jesus gave not one only but many new commandments, of which ten may be counted as prominent. Five times in his farewell words at the last supper, he declared that the badge of true friends should be the keeping of his "commandments."

A DORMITORY CONFERENCE

"NOW I LAY ME"

"WON'T WE HAVE GOOD TIMES?"

A HAPPY FOURTH AT MONT-LAWN

IN front of the main building, on a green knoll sloping down to the woodland and overlooking the Hudson, stands Mont-Lawn's tall flag-pole, and from it floats the Stars and Stripes. As you approach the Home, "Old Glory," seems to be flying almost among the clouds. This flag is the centre of many patriotic exercises and of innumerable childish delights on the Fourth of July, which is ever a red-letter day at our Children's Home. From the time morning breaks over the hills, until the last red rocket dies in a starry sky, the hours are winged with pleasure for little ones, many of whom never before had cause to greet the Fourth with gladness. Wee toilers of the city, tenement-house starvelings, tiny "strangers within our gates" hailing from foreign lands, and all unknowing that they have a country, learn on that day to associate our beautiful flag with thoughts of happiness and protection. There come, too, impulses still more blessed as their fresh young voices acclaim:

Our Father's God to thee,
Author of liberty,
To thee we sing,
Long may our land be bright,
With freedom's holy light,
Protect us by thy might,
Great God our King.

Our recent patriotic holiday witnessed the opening of two pretty new memorial buildings—Gibbals' Cottage, erected by Miss Sarah J. Tibbals, as a tribute to the memory of her brother, Mr. Lewis P. Tibbals, and the Lodge, which is in part the gift of one whose name is written with that of many another friend of our Children's Home (some of whom had but the widow's mite to give) in that Book of Good Deeds which the angels keep. The original buildings have all seen hard service, and fortunate it is for our waifs that God put it into kindly hearts to aid us in raising new shelters for his little ones. The opening exercises were very brief and simple; upon the programme for the dedi-

sion, and others; for special musical features, Miss Hallimond lent her beautiful voice, and her mother assisted her. The children were not excluded, however. Everybody at Mont-Lawn, including visitors, always agree that the children's rapturous singing and the children's speeches are the very best part of any service or entertainment.

Dinner on the Fourth is a marvelous feast of unheard-of dainties to the tenement child. The eager appetites with which our small people address themselves to bounties set forth on the long tables under the big white tent, is at once amusing and pathetic. The thin little ones, whose hands are going always up, and whose voices continually invite teacher to replenish their plates, have possibly never had a square meal before in their lives. Perhaps with the memory of this feast, there will linger in each child's mind some memory of the pretty grace said around the tables:

God is great, God is good,
And we thank him for this food.

When marches, songs, flag-drills and flag-salutes are over, enthusiastic little patriots are ready enough for the "ice cream festival." To over 200 children sitting in a great circle on the green lawn this frozen dainty is dispensed. This is really their crown of delight, until the fireworks come. Then shouts and clapping of hands hail every trailing glory that cleaves the sky. It has not lessened their joys that they have been allowed to share them with others. Our children are Mont-Lawn's hosts, for the Home is theirs. They have dispensed the rites of hospitality—an unknown privilege to many of them. Friends from New York, neighboring towns on the

THE NEW BRITISH AMBASSADOR

THE Hon. Michael Herbert, the late Lord Pauncefote's newly-appointed successor as British Ambassador at Washington, is a comparatively young man, who has already had a brilliant diplomatic career. In 1888, he was Charge d'Affaires here, and during the anxious period following Sackville-West's dismissal, showed himself master of a most trying situation and won hosts of American friends; in 1892 he became, by promotion, Secretary of Legation. As British agent during the arbitration of the Venezuelan boundary, he had further opportunities of studying American thought and ways, which, says an English paper, "no other non-American so thoroughly understands is he." The same authority refers to his having in American wife, as a "positive virtue" and "a merit," under the situation. Mrs. Herbert was Miss Leila Wilson, of New York, sister of Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, and by birth and marriage connected with many prominent American families. Mr. Herbert is younger son of the late Right Hon. Sidney Herbert (afterward Lord Herbert of Lea), and brother of Lord Pembroke. In his diplomatic work, covering twenty-five years, he has served his country at the Hague, Constantinople, and other important points. He comes to us direct from France, where he has been Secretary of Legation, with rank of Minister Plenipotentiary. He was very popular in Paris with the American colony. His associates there congratulated him on his return to this country, which it was known he had long desired. Lord Pauncefote, say the British press, recommended him as his successor when his place should become vacant; and our Government signified preference for his appointment. The new ambassador has a high forehead, grave, piercing eyes, a moustache concealing a firm mouth, and a smile which betokens geniality. Already greatly esteemed in several capitals, he is certain, in his new sphere in Washington, to make many new friends, and to render still more valuable services in promoting friendly relations between the two nations.

America's Sympathy with Britain

WITH the people of Great Britain, the Christian public of America sympathizes sincerely in this time of sorrow and disappointment. That their king should have been stricken down on the very eve of the supreme day of jubilation was an event that must have sorely tried their souls. They had prepared with so heartfelt an enthusiasm to celebrate his coronation, and had fully expected to witness a spectacle unprecedented for magnificence in their history, that the frustration of their hopes must be hard to bear. It was intensified, too, by the joy with which they were making the ceremony a celebration of the advent of peace. How keen and bitter must their mortification have been when they learned that the central figure around which all the festivity turned, was prostrated by illness and in imminent danger of death! It is gratifying to learn that in their hour of sorrow they turned to God for succor. On the day appointed for the celebration, the illustrious throng who were invited to participate in it, laying aside their gorgeous robes and blazing jewels, went to the metropolitan cathedral to supplicate the mercy of God. Most heartily do the people of this country feel for them in their disappointment, and pray that He who is able to bring good out of affliction, may make even this trial a source of national blessing.

Room Kept for Jesus

HISTORY tells us that in ancient Madrid the rule was that, except where there was a special stipulation to the contrary, the upper rooms of all houses belonged to the king. However humble your house, if it had been built in those days, under the common law of Spain the upper chambers were royal possessions.

Is it not worth our while to ask our hearts the question, Is there any chamber in my house that belongs to the King? Do I keep a chair which he will turn into a throne by sitting in it? Do I keep one crust which he may turn into a feast by breaking it? Is there anything in all this heart-house of mine peculiarly and surely the King's?

Oh, let us make the whole house his, from top to bottom. From garret to cellar let us furnish it with such thoughts, hopes, purposes, desires, aspirations, that the King will know it to be meant for him, and know that he is Lord of it all.

The Potency of Prayer

OUR "question of the week," relative to the power of prayer, has elicited the history of many varied and helpful experiences. All of these illustrate the truth—known to every true Christian—that prayer is the mightiest weapon at his command. It is even more than this; it is the wireless telegraph that places the believer in direct communication with the Maker and Preserver of all things, who has assured us, in the person of his Divine Son, that whatsoever we shall ask, in that holy name, and in the spirit of faith, shall be granted to us.

All history is full of instances of answered prayer. From the days of Enos—when "men began to call upon the name of the Lord"—down, to our own times, countless petitions have daily ascended, which have been answered in a way that the believing soul can discern and understand, though the unspiritual may scoff and call it chance or coincidence. From king and peasant, ruler and slave, prophet and humble apostle, rich and poor, in all places and under every conceivable condition, those prayers have risen to God, and the result has influenced the whole history of the human race.

More things are wrought by prayer Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice Rise like a fountain for me day and night, For what are men better than sheep or goats, That nourish a blind life within the brain, If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer?

Prayer has been pictured as having strong wings for flight, and a thousand arms to reach up to the very throne of God itself; but the description is an inadequate one. Only the believer, whose life is attuned to the Divine will, and who waits on God continually, realizes the potency of the prayer of faith, and even he is amazed at the tremendous power that comes of resting on the Saviour's assurance and taking God at his word. He can say, with assurance, that God does better for us than we can ask or think. Thus, prayer needs no eloquence, since it is the language of the heart and not of the lips. A single syllable of mute appeal, wrung from the soul, weighs more with the Father than a multitude of oratorical phrases. Though what we ask in error may be denied, we soon recognize in the denial the wisest and kindest answer.

A life of prayer—of close and constant dependence upon and submission to the Divine will—is the ideal Christian life, and is calculated to develop the highest type of spiritual character. If the praying Christian is the child at his Father's knee, he is also the soldier fully armed and prepared for every emergency in the battle of life. He is shoulder to shoulder with deity. Prayer drives out pusillanimity and it infuses courage, even in the most timid soul. It brings out to best advantage all the virtues, and moulds us more and more into the likeness of Jesus, the Mediator, by virtue of whose promise no sincere petition, offered in his name, ever remains unanswered.

Living for the Coming Time

NO man's faith is right, no man's religion is of the worthiest type, if "mine" and "here" and "now" are its bounding terms. No man's prayer is according to Christ's standard if it does not sweep with its vision the nations of the world and the ages of the future—all his heart rejoicing if he may be identified, in however humble and unnoticed a way, with the interests of Christ's universal and everlasting reign.

In the old border wars of Scotland, the tidings of invasion and the summons to arms were carried by the fiery cross. One runner took it and went at full speed to a certain point, telling the news as he went, and then gave it to another, who ran on in like manner. It was not for one of the messengers to whom that summons came to sit down and prepare for the defence of his own house, and the protection of his own flocks and herds. He must take the cross and run for the next stop. So the message of Christ's Cross points us beyond ourselves, and our own interests, and our own times. It lays on us the charge of the coming time. It bids us do our best in our own time as a means of making that Cross the central fact of the future time. Here is the nobility of Christian living—to take this larger view; to look at ourselves through the small end, and at God's Kingdom through the large end of the field-glass; to see with sweet content a future good which is not for us, and cheerfully to give our energy, make our sacrifices and endure our sufferings in order that the coming man and the coming time may be better than ourselves and our own time; that those who catch the torch from our failing hands may lose no time in kindling it afresh, but leap forward with shouts of victory to the goal.

Religious Notes

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN have begun a Gospel tent campaign in St. Louis, Mo. All the Methodist churches in the district are uniting in the work. Two tents are used, with a combined seating capacity of three thousand.

—LARGELY ATTENDED union evangelistic services were lately held at Warsaw, Ind., when Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Mr. S. H. Hadley of the Jerry McAuley Mission, and others delivered addresses. The musical services were in charge of Prof. W. S. Weeden.

—FIFTY-FIVE new members united with the second Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., on a recent Sunday morning, upon the return of Pastor S. Edward Young and Mrs. Young from Palestine. Two hundred and twenty-six have joined on confession of faith during the last twelve months.

AT LEWISTOWN, ILL., the churches united and invited evangelists Smiley and M'Kinsey. A temporary tabernacle was erected, seating twelve hundred people. The evangelists preached and sang the Gospel for three weeks; the crowds came night after night. Entire families were won to Christ, and large accessions were made to all the churches.

—A FEW MONTHS ago, the people of Rossville, Ind., a town of about eight hundred inhabitants, started a movement that resulted in the securing of the singing evangelist, W. S. Weeden and his gospel tent "Glad Tidings." With Mr. Weeden came evangelist J. W. Van Deventer. The meetings, begun on May 25, have grown steadily. Rev. W. E. Beiderwolf is now laboring with the evangelists. Many are confessing Christ.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Waiting in Heaven

—LET US, old and young, rejoice that heaven is gathering up so much that is attractive. In that far land we are not strangers. There are those there who speak our name day by day, and they wonder why so long we tarry. If I could count up the names of all those who have gone out from these families into the kingdom of heaven, it would take me all day to mention their names. A great multitude before the throne. You loved them once; you love them now; and ever and anon you think you hear their voices calling you upward. You want no book to tell you of the dying experience of Christian children. You have heard it; it has been whispered in your ear, O father, O mother, O brother, O sister. Toward that good land all Christians are journeying. This snapping of heart-strings, this flight of years, this tread of the heart reminds us that we are passing. Before we mount our throne, before we drink of the fountain, before we strike the harp of our eternal celebration, we will cry out, "Where are our loved and lost?" And then, how we shall gather them up! O, how we shall gather them up!

Divine Sympathy

—CHRIST KNOWS what it is to leave this world, of the beauty of which he was more appreciative than we ever could be. He knows the exquisiteness of the phosphorescence of the sea; he trod it. He knows the glories of the midnight heavens, for they were the spangled canopy of his wilderness pillow. He knows about the lilies; he twisted them into his sermon. He knows about the fowls of the air; they whirled their way through his discourse. He knows about the sorrows of leaving this beautiful world. Not a taper was kindled in the darkness. He died physicianless. He died in cold sweat, and dizziness, and hemorrhage, and agony, that have put him in sympathy with all the dying. He goes through Christendom and he gathers up the stings of all the death pillows, and he puts them under his own neck and head. He gathers on his own tongue the burning thirsts of many generations. The sponge is soaked in the sorrows of all those who have died in their beds, as well as soaked in the sorrows of all those who perished in an icy or fiery martyrdom.

A Noble Mission

—I CONGRATULATE all those who are toiling for the outcast and the wandering. Your work will soon be over, but the influence you are setting in motion will never stop. Long after you have been garnered for the skies, your prayers, your teachings, and your Christian influence will go on, and help to people heaven with bright inhabitants. Which would you rather see?—which scene would you rather mingle in, in the last great day—being able to say, "I added house to house, and land to land, and manufactory to manufactory; I owned half the city; whatever my eye saw I had whatever I wanted I got;" or on that day to have Christ look you full in the face and say, "I was hungry, and ye fed me; I was naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick and in prison, and ye visited me; inasmuch as ye did it to the least of these my brethren, ye did it to me?"

A Threefold Liberator

—WHO ARE those men who listen with moist eye as you tell them of suffering, and who have a pathos in their voice and a kindness in their manner, and an excuse or an alleviation for those gone astray? They are the men who have graduated at the Royal Academy of Trouble, and they have the diploma written in wrinkles on their countenances. My my! What heartaches they had! What tears they have wept! What injustice they have suffered! The mightiest influence for purification and salvation is trouble. No diamond fit for a crown until it is cut. No wheat fit for bread till it is ground. There are only three things that can break off a chain—a hammer, a file, or a fire; and trouble is all three of them.

A Strong Cable

—WOULD GOD that there might be some one to-day who would go forth and bring in these souls that are drifting. In every town, how many—a score shall I say, or a hundred, or a thousand?—not quite certain about anything in the Bible, not quite certain about their immortality, not quite certain about anything, drifting, drifting, drifting. Oh! how I would like to tow them in. I throw you this cable. Lay hold of the cable of the Gospel. Lay hold of it. I invite you all in. The harbor is wide enough, large enough for all the shipping. Come in, O you wanderers on the deep! Drift no more, drift no more. Come into the harbor. See the glorious lighthouse of the Gospel. "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Disappointment in England

LIKE a bolt out of the clear sky, was the blow that on Tuesday, June 24, fell on the people of Great Britain, and on the ambassadors, who had come from all lands to participate in the pageant of the coronation. London had put on its gala attire, the ancient buildings were gay with bunting, the materials for splendid illumination were in place, the noble lords and ladies had brought out the glittering coronets, which had not seen the light of day for more than sixty years, and everything was ready for a ceremony more magnificent than any that had been witnessed by this generation. Pessimistic forebodings had been set at rest, for King Edward had come to the city to be crowned, and was then in the great palace beginning the preliminary festivities. How crushing, then, must have been the blow, when it was announced that dire illness had seized the king, and that instead of being crowned in the historic Abbey, he must be stretched on a hospital operating table to undergo an operation that put his life in imminent peril. Sympathy and concern for him, mingled with disappointment that the great holiday was transformed into a time of gloom, were in all hearts. Every one was eager to know the facts. The five eminent surgeons who had charge of the case were, however, not very communicative. Gradually it was learned that a condition closely resembling appendicitis had developed. When the necessary incision was made, the surgeons found that the seat of the trouble was not in the vermiform appendix, which is generally the part affected in such cases, but in a large abscess, which, happily, had not begun to discharge. Its presence being sufficient to account for all the symptoms, a further investigation was not made. The abscess was drained, and tubes were inserted to carry off any further purulent matter that might collect, and the wound was left open. The king bore the operation well, and showed a calmness that elicited the admiration of all about him. He was, however, deeply concerned at the disappointment resulting to the people, and expressed his wish to minimize it as far as possible. He begged especially that the poor of London, who had been invited to a feast in honor of the coronation, might not be deprived of their expected treat, and that every festivity which could take place without him, should be held as originally planned. The people, on their side, manifested their sympathy with him. The bulletins issued four times a day announcing his condition, were eagerly read by great crowds which assembled outside Buckingham Palace, where he was lying. These until the close of the week were hopeful. The Coronation guests, and all who were entitled to seats in Westminster Abbey, were informed that a service of prayer for the king's recovery would be held at St. Paul's Cathedral at the hour that had been appointed for the Coronation. Thither they went, and a solemn time of supplication was spent in the great edifice. In churches of all denominations, Catholic as well as Protestant, in the Jewish synagogues, and in the assemblies of Hindoos, Mohammedans, and other Orientals, prayers were offered that the king's life might be spared. There was, however, a general foreboding of the worst, and an apprehension of impending bereavement. It was clear that the sorrow was genuine, showing that the king had won the cordial good-will of the people. Every one knew that his death would not disturb the government, but that he would, if he died, be succeeded by his son. Of the latter, however, they knew comparatively little, while the king had lived among them for more than sixty years and was personally popular. There will be no doubt of their loyalty being given to the next heir to the throne, George V., the only surviving son of the king, who, with his wife the Princess of Wales, recently visited Australia; but his retiring disposition and his diffident manner, will never win for him the enthusiastic regard that the people have given to the genial, good-humored King Edward. Their affection and their faith were, therefore, shown in the unanimity with which, in their suspense, they turned to Him, of whom the Psalmist wrote:

It is he that giveth salvation unto kings (Ps. 144: 10).

A Naive Admission

A young man appeared a few days ago before a judge in a police court at Morrisania, N. Y., to answer the complaint of a widow, whom he was charged with defrauding. She said that he had been very assiduous in making love to her, and eventually they became engaged. He gave her an engagement ring, and had been introduced to her family as her future husband. One day he told her that he had been suddenly called away on a business trip, which would be extremely profitable, and as he must start early in the morning, before the banks were open, he would have to find some friend who would lend him enough for his fare. She fact so impressed the boy that he determined to come. He stowed away on the first ship that left Trieste, which happened to be going to Alexandria, Egypt. He was found, and set to work. Stowing away again at Alexandria, he reached Liverpool. There, he hid on board the Saxonia, which brought him to America, but being described as a stowaway, the immigration officers sent him back. No sooner was he in Liverpool again than he hid on board the Umbria. On his arrival in New York he frankly told his story, and the Commissioner took compassion on him. He said, "A lad who has gone through all that deserves to succeed," and he has allowed him to stay. It is a pity that so few are so persistent in their efforts to enter the kingdom of God. Christ explicitly encouraged all such.

From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and men of violence take it by force (Matt. 11: 12).

The Monogram Waist

A new freak of fashion is causing some amusement as well as surprise in New York. A dealer in men's furnishings, introduced last season a line of men's negligee shirts with the monogram of the wearer worked on the sleeve in colored silk. The fashion became so popular that ladies' waists have this year been sold similarly embroidered. Lately, according to a fashion journal, a variation has appeared in these articles. Young ladies have appeared in white waists, with the monogram of their lovers embroidered in blue silk on the left sleeve. It is said that the young men to whom they are engaged aver that the device tends to keep rivals at a distance. Probably a lady who is sufficiently attached to a man to wear his monogram, does not need that protection, but if it saves her from temptation to disloyalty, it is useful. It would be well if the Christian were protected from that temptation. He does not, however, need to be so labeled if his life shows that he belongs to Christ.

By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another (John 13: 35).

told him she would lend him thirty dollars, and he gladly borrowed it. Before leaving, he got her engagement ring from her, on the pretext of having their joint initials engraved on it. He went away, and she neither saw nor heard any more of him until, some months later, she accidentally heard of his being engaged to a girl in New Jersey. Then she summoned him to recover her money and the ring. In answer, the young man said that the money was a gift, not a loan, and that the ring belonged to another girl, to whom he had given it first. He admitted the engagement, but said it was no crime to break an engagement, and, as a matter of fact, he was always engaged to someone. The judge indignantly ordered him to return the money and the ring, or to be committed to prison until he complied. Unhappily, many young men in these days are similarly preying on women by pretending affection and promising them marriage. Many, too, from desire of gain, do not hesitate to deceive in still more sacred things, pledging themselves to Christ in order to curry favor with Christian people. Even in apostolic times such deceivers were apparently not unknown.

Through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you (II. Peter 2: 3).

A Persistent Immigrant

A young man landed in New York last week who has experienced no little difficulty in obtaining a footing in the United States. He lived with his father and mother and six brothers and sisters on a little farm in the Austrian province of Dalmatia. The farm was very poor, and its produce was a meagre support for the family. One of the boy's companions had succeeded in getting to America, and wrote him, advising him to come. He said that here, "if one works, one has something." That spent most of the winter in Scotland—where Paul Moody has been studying with Professor Davidson, of Edinburgh—was the recipient of an enthusiastic demonstration of welcome on arriving at Northfield.

The effort to raise $50,000 to establish a manual training school for the Goodwill Home for Boys at East Fairfield, Me., has been successful.

The International Bible Reading Association of London, England, reported at its last annual meeting 740,000 members, with cards and helps printed in thirty or more languages.

The year book of the Young Men's Christian Association just issued shows that the Associations in the United States and Canada have increased from 1,476 to 1,575. The membership increased from 268,477 to 323,224.

The Charity Organization Society of New York is holding a summer school in its rooms in Fourth avenue, at which workers from other cities are conferring with those of the city on the best measures for administering temporary relief and permanently solving the problem of poverty.

Rev. W. R. Newell, of the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago is holding meetings in a tent during the summer. He is asking for help to erect a great tabernacle near the centre of the city, for a continuance of the work through the winter.

Pundita Ramabai writes us that of the nineteen hundred child-widows now in her institutions, over sixteen hundred have been baptized at their own request. She asks the prayers of our readers for these girls, that they may be kept faithful to Christ. Other missionaries also send encouraging reports.

A chapter of the College Settlement Association has recently been organized at Mount Holyoke College, with the threefold object of the support of the association, the examination of social conditions in cities and elsewhere, and the spreading of the college settlement principle of fellowship.

The English Congregational Union is arranging a plan for the support of aged ministers. The proposition most favored is to collect a premium from ministers and churches. In the minister's case, if he will pay $25 a year from the age of twenty-five to the age of sixty-five, the Union will guarantee him an annuity of $325.

At the annual meeting of the International missionary Union at Clifton Springs, N. Y., over one hundred and fifty missionaries were present, representing many denominations. Farewell meetings were held for thirteen young missionaries going for the first time to foreign fields, and at the closing session to forty missionaries about to return to their stations.

Prayer Revealed the Path

One Lord's Day in the summer of 1884 I had occasion to go through a dense wood, with thick undergrowth and no path to reach my appointment. I had my bearing correct at the starting point, but I advanced slowly on account of the thick bushes, and after a time I found out that I was traveling in a circle. Although the sun was high toward the meridian, I could only see the rays as they penetrated through the thick branches of the tall trees overhead. I was lost. I had consumed much time in wandering, and looked at my watch; it was nearly time to begin the service. I knelt a moment in prayer, for our Father to direct me. Although I had been in a tangled wildwood, I was soon in the clearing, and reached my appointment only a little late. D. S. B.

No Earnest Prayer Unanswered

Christ will hear when his children cry, and give them succor. If he can always provide food for the orphans who cry, he can certainly hear others. He will not turn a deaf ear to any one who cries in faith. His commands are, pray without ceasing, and by keeping his commands are we able to keep in touch with him, and keep him near us for him to answer us. But he will most assuredly answer when we cry in faith and are truly needful. In the daily temptations of life, if we pray in faith, he will not put upon us temptations above what we are able to bear; but unless we cry for strength to withstand them, we will most surely fall.

A Source of Unlimited Power

Prayer, by engaging a Divine power, becomes an agent whose power is incalculable and incomparable. God has revealed its almost unlimited power. "Ye receive not because ye ask not." "Ask and ye shall receive." "Able to do exceeding abundantly, above all that we ask or think." A minister who began work on a circuit with no assurance of adequate support, found prayer to be the means by which, at many different times, his temporal needs were supplied. On one occasion, when the greatest need was fuel, and the last armful of wood had been brought in, the need was told to no one save God. In the morning, the minister saw a load of wood being unloaded in his yard by a man whom he did not know. The man said it was a gift, if possible, asking God to protect you from the evil that might assail you." Time passed, and after years of absence my boy returned to me, saved from harm. In recounting some of the events of his foreign experience, one thing struck me as being full of danger, and I interrupted his story by saying, "O, my boy! were you not terribly frightened?" He looked at me lovingly, and said, "How could I be frightened when I knew that so potent an agent as my mother's prayers was at work for me?" In his case, it was faith in a mother's prayers that nerved him to meet the dangerous ordeal unflinchingly. Prayer, as a weapon of defence, is ever within the reach of all who will command it.

The Chain that Binds us to God

More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of.
For so in every way is this round globe
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

Prayer lays hold on omnipotence. It is man's best hold. "To whom can we go but young son and I were on our way to Sunday School in a one-horse buggy, we saw a horse, hitched to a buggy, coming down the street at a mad pace. We drove close to the sidewalk, and my son got out. We hoped to escape, but as the horse noticed us there, it made one mad leap right at me. I had only one moment to ask, "God help me," when I was thrown ten feet, but escaped with only a few bruises. The two buggies were a mass of chaos—the horse so wrapped in the harness that he could not plunge at me or move until help came. The crowd which soon gathered were amazed to find me unhurt. I said, "No human power could have saved me. God answered my short, gasping prayer."

Prayer is Spiritual Life

Prayer is the Christian's greatest source of power, because it is instantly at his command (Isaiah 65: 24). "Before they call I will answer, and while they are yet speaking I will hear." What an incentive to prayer, to feel that, in times of sorrow, trouble or temptation God our Father is ever waiting to hear the cry of his children for help, and even while we are yet speaking, the answers are flashing back over the wireless telegraphy of heaven. Prayer is life. Life without prayer could be compared to a vessel at sea without a chart, driven with the fierce winds and tossed in the storms of life; but to the prayerful life what an anchor to the soul!

F. M. B.

The Christian a Child of Privilege

"Prayer does not change the purposes of God, for God purposes to answer prayer." God acts according to the laws which he has made and one of those laws is that the prayers of his own children shall bring about that which otherwise would not occur. Therefore to be a Christian, a child of God, and to know how to pray, is a supreme privilege. A parent may fail in answering his child's request, because he is not all-powerful, but with the King of the Universe, our Father, there is no such limitation.

Thou art coming to a King,
Large petitions with thee bring.
God is no respecter of persons and large faith receives always large returns. George Muller is an illustration of this. He asked for land buildings and money to support orphans, and God permitted eight million dollars to pass through his hand, in answer to prayer. In Russia, at this day, the prayers of "Father John" avail for the healing of multitudes, and even in the humble life of the writer, prayer has been answered in the conversion of souls, and in guidance as to the investment of money which has proven most successful in large returns. AGNES M. BIGELOW.

A Young Girl's Experience

I know of a case where prayer availed greatly, and here set down as truth, rejoicing that I am yet alive to testify as to the efficacy of prevailing prayer. She was a young girl, when, through a friend, she found herself the Lord Jesus Christ. She lived in a community where there was no church. It was a great trial to the sweet, simple country girl, that there was no place outside her own hearth and home where she could worship God. It set her to praying earnestly for a church home, not only for herself, but all that ungodly community. Then, too, her own people had fallen away from God. They had been a time when her father, mother and older sisters had at least been nominal Christians. All this was a great burden on the heart of the girl. It sobered her young life. Other trials came. She lived to be victorious over all, and to-day the whole family are devout Christians, and there is an orthodox church in the country place where she lives and died. This is absolutely true.

Prayer that Saved a Brother

Prayer is intended to convey
The blessings God designs to give.

"But," say some, "we cannot be sure that God will give us what we ask, but only that he will give what is needful and best; and will he not give this, whether we ask or not?" Really we cannot be sure that he will; we may forfeit more blessings than we dream of by neglecting to ask. A minister once told me that amid much discouragement he prayed for the conversion of a brother twenty years, and at last had the joy of seeing him brought into the Kingdom. Who can doubt that that brother was saved in answer to prayer?

AMELIA HOYT.

The Power of a Mother's Prayers

Years ago, I sent my boy out into the world to earn his own livelihood. I had no gold to give him, but assured him that my prayers would follow him wherever he went, but especially during the evening hours, that are so full of temptation to homeless young men. As I kissed him "good-by," I said to him, with tears in my eyes, "Remember, my son, that at ten o'clock every night during your absence, your mother will be upon her knees, unto Thee?" "Thou hast the words of eternal life." In a home trial God made himself known in the restoration of our child, when physicians despaired of his life. "Effectual, fervent prayer" was offered for him. God gave him back to us. In the changes of pastures there have been manifest leadings of God, literal answers to prayer. With joy the confession is made.

A Fire Controlled by Prayer

My grandfather was the only man for miles around, when a fire he had started in the brush got beyond his control. Grandmother saw it and rushed out. I was not quite four years old, but still see the slender, graceful form, white face and long, soft, black, curling hair, streaming behind her, as she came down the steps, looking first at the fire, then at the sky, where a cloud was rising. She dropped on her knees, lifted both hands and her face to heaven, and cried, "O Lord, send the rain quick to put the fire out, for we never can do it." Then she sprang up and with a broom began to fight the fire. In about fifteen minutes a smart shower put it out.

The Midsummer Stars

Their Present Aspect and Position in the Heavens Described

AT no other time of the year can one so easily and pleasantly make acquaintance with the stars and constellations, or renew a former friendship with them, as in summer. The light of the summer stars is as soft as the touch of the summer wind. The stars share the tranquillity of the season. In winter they sparkle and scintillate, but in summer they glow and glimmer. The difference is atmospheric upon it like a caress, and a harmonious calm reigns throughout celestial space.

So, for those who would include the glories of the heavens in their summer sight-seeing and their summer meditations, this article has been prepared.

First, a word about the chart. It represents the whole face of the sky as it appears about 10 p.m. on the 1st of July, 9 p.m. in the middle of July, and 8 p.m. on the 1st of August. The centre of the chart is the zenith, or point directly overhead. The chart is drawn from the latitude of New York, but it will present no serious discrepancy for any part of the United States. Through the middle, from north to south, runs the meridian line. The celestial equator and the ecliptic are seen traversing the heavens south of the zenith, and crossing one another in the western part of the chart. It is hardly necessary to say that these are purely imaginary lines, serving to locate the stars and the planets, the ecliptic being the apparent yearly path of the sun around the heavens.

Rather low down in the south, exactly on the meridian, appears the bright, reddish star Antares, in the constellation Scorpio. We may take this as a starting-point for a description of the summer stars. The color of Antares will strike the eye at once. There is no other conspicuous star having the same hue. Fire-red describes it perhaps as well as any phrase that could be used. The reader who possesses a good astronomical telescope, of not less than four or five inches aperture, will be able to see the little green companion star that seems almost to touch the disk of Antares. The contrast of the two colors produces a beautiful effect. As the chart shows, the remaining stars of the constellation Scorpio are arranged in a very striking manner. The uppermost of the three stars just to the west, on the right of Antares, is Beta Scorpionis, another beautiful double, which can be separated by a much smaller telescope than Antares requires. In the other direction, downward and toward the east, the stars of Scorpio form a long curved line, finally terminating in a pair, which marks the end of the up-raised tail of the imaginary Scorpion. Antares is in the heart of the animal and Beta is in one of its claws. To the left of Scorpio the observer will notice the Milky Way, which seems to come pouring down from mid-heaven, east of the zenith, in floods of flaky light, of which a fuller description than there is here room for, will be found in my Astronomy with an Opera-glass. There are many hours of rare pleasure in store for the observer in this part of the sky. Partly immersed in the Milky Way is the constellation Sagittarius, several of whose stars form a rude figure of a short-handled dipper, sometimes spoken of as the "Milk Dipper." Near the eastern end of this constellation, and just emerging from the mists of the horizon at the hour represented by the chart, is the planet Saturn. There is no star near equalling it in brightness, and a small telescope instantly identifies it, by showing its wonderful ring.

Still further east, just on the rim of the horizon at the same hour, is the planet Jupiter, much brighter than Saturn, and also recognizable because it has no rivals. By waiting an hour or two later than the time for which the chart was drawn, say until 11 o'clock on the 1st of July, 10 o'clock in the middle of that month, and 9 o'clock on the first of August, Saturn and Jupiter will be seen much higher in the heavens, and consequently to far greater advantage.

We now turn our attention to the west. To the right of Scorpio appears Libra, not a very conspicuous constellation, marked by two widely separated stars, which indicate the balances of the imaginary "Scale." West of Libra comes Virgo, with the bright white star Spica, while north of west Leo, with its "sickle," having Regulus at the end of the handle, is seen near to setting.

Above Virgo glimmers the little group of Coma Berenices. Slightly higher and to the left of Coma, shines the great star Arcturus, one of the brightest in the sky, which has a reddish tinge when seen near the horizon, but which loses most of its color and appears yellowish-white when high in the heavens. Arcturus is the chief star of the constellation Bootes, which contains a beautiful telescopic object, the double star Epsilon Bootes. This star may be found in the following manner: East of Arcturus, and almost in the zenith, is the conspicuous circlet of Corona Borealis, the Northern Crown, and about half way between, but a little northward of an imaginary line joining Arcturus and Corona, shines a second magnitude star, which is the Epsilon Bootes we are seeking.

Below Bootes, in the northwest, is Ursa Major, the Great Dipper, which forms the most conspicuous part of the constellation, standing upright with the bowl toward the horizon. The middle star of the three, forming the handle, is Mizar, and its little naked-eye companion, Alcor, can readily be seen by most eyes.

Between the upper end of the Dipper handle and Coma Berenices is the fine double star Cor Caroli in the constellation called the Hunting Dogs.

A small telescope divides this star, and shows the delicate blue of its smaller component.

Returning to the Northern Crown, just west of the zenith, we see that it is balanced on the east of the zenith by the irregular quadrangle in the constellation Hercules, within whose boundaries lies the celebrated star cluster, which, although but a faint point of light to the naked eye, appears in a good telescope as a spherical mass, composed of thousands of crowded stars. Under Hercules, northward, are the diamond-shaped figure in the head of Draco, and the "Little Dipper" of Ursa Minor, standing with the end of its handle poised, as it were, on the Pole Star.

From the Pole Star the eye drops down to Cassiopeia, whose W-shaped outline lies in the Milky Way, east of the north point of the horizon. Following the course of the Galaxy (Milky Way) upward, we come to the Northern Cross, a very clearly-marked figure, the main beam of the Cross lying parallel with the course of the Milky Way, in which it might be said to float. The star in the foot of the Cross (the southern end of the beam) is Albireo, or Beta Cygni, a most beautiful object for the telescope. Only a slight magnifying power, from twenty-five to fifty diameters, is required to divide this star into two surprisingly fine companions, of which the larger is golden yellow and the smaller clear, deep blue. It is a strange thought that these two splendidly contrasted stars are suns, so near to one another, as compared with their distance from us, that to the inhabitants of a world revolving around either of them, the other would appear as the most brilliant star in the heavens.

The constellation Cygnus, which includes the Northern Cross, also contains the nearest known star in the Northern hemisphere, 61 Cygni, but it is a very inconspicuous star to the naked eye, and in order to find it the reader should consult a book specially devoted to telescopic observations.

West of the Cross, between it and Hercules, the observer cannot fail to notice the extremely brilliant Vega, the brightest star in the small constellation Lyra, and, like Arcturus, one of the brightest in all the heavens. It is interesting to compare Vega and Arcturus on account of their difference of color. Arcturus, as already remarked, has an element of red or yellow in its light. Vega, on the other hand, is blue-white, as pure of hue as the costliest diamond, but incomparably more radiant than any terrestrial gem. The telescope increases the splendor of its light and color.

Two little, fourth magnitude stars, will be seen forming with Vega a very small triangle. The northernmost of these is Epsilon Lyrae, the famous quadruple, or double-double star. A good, but not very large telescope is needed to reveal the peculiar beauty of this object.

In this constellation also exists the "Ring Nebula," but, as it cannot be seen with the naked eye, no attempt is here made to direct the reader in finding it.

Following the Milky Way down from the foot of the Cross, the eye encounters the constellation Aquila, whose brightest star, Altair, has two

Prohibition is now Canada's Goal

CANADA unquestionably takes a leading place in the matter of temperance reform. For many years the progress in this direction has been steady and marked. A great change is everywhere manifest in relation to strong drink. Liquor is now largely banished from the Canadian home, and friends and neighbors can meet for the exchange of work and social intercourse with no thought of drinking. In rural districts, hundreds of public houses are closed, and few taverns found at the cross roads.

The number of licenses issued in both urban and rural communities shows a great decrease during the first twenty-five years. This decrease has been most marked in the Province of Ontario, where tavern licenses have been reduced from 4,793 to 2,621, shop licenses from 1,307 to 308, wholesale licenses from 52 to 21, while the 33 vessel licenses have been done away with. Twenty-five years ago, one license represented 278 of the population, and to-day it represents 700. The licenses, too, carry greatly increased restrictions with regard to the persons to whom liquor may be sold, and the days and hours for selling.

Still, there is drinking and drunkenness, though much diminished, and temperance people continue relentless in their war against the liquor traffic. Various restrictive and partially prohibitory measures, such as the Dunkin Bill, the Scott Act, and local option have been adopted with disappointing results, and as a consequence, a more effective measure has been aimed at, and prohibition made the goal. Manitoba, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, and Ontario took in turn a plebiscite on the questions, with a most satisfactory vote from the standpoint of prohibition; but as the legality of the Provinces to legislate on the question was in doubt, nothing was done. The next step then was a Dominion plebiscite, inasmuch as a prohibitory measure by the Federal Parliament could not be disputed. This was taken nearly four years ago, and resulted in a majority of some 15,000 for prohibition, but as the Province of Quebec, and many of the large towns and cities pronounced strongly against the measure, parliament refused to legislate. Extreme prohibitionists were of course greatly disappointed, but many temperance people thought the decision of the government was wise.

Back again the matter went to the Provinces. Manitoba,

REV. W. A. MACKAY

REV. J. P. GERRIE

which first submitted this plebiscite, was also the first to legislate. During the Provincial campaign of 1900, the Hon. Hugh John Macdonald pledged that, if trusted with power, he would enact prohibitory legislation. Successful at the polls, the promise was made good. The measure which was passed aims at closing all places where liquor is sold both by the glass and in bulk, with the exception of drug stores, where it can be procured under the certificate of a physician. The manufacture of liquor for use outside of the Province is not prohibited, but the dispensing of free drinks or liquor in any form becomes actionable. Yet once the legality of the act was challenged, and after running the gauntlet of the different courts, it has been declared constitutional by the Privy Council of England, the highest court in the British realm.

Prohibitionists, however, are not yet at their goal, since Premier Roblin, who succeeded Mr. Macdonald, is about to adopt the strange proceeding of a Referendum in connection with the enforcement of the act, which is now on the statute books in common with other laws.

The decision of the Privy Council also opens up the way for action in other Provinces. Prince Edward Island is now waiting for the expiration of the license year to enforce a similar law, and Ontario is the chief storm centre, over a Referendum, which is similar in its details to the Manitoba law, and which will be submitted to the people on Dec. 5. This measure is opposed by many Prohibitionists, on the ground that the Government was previously pledged to legislate to the full extent of its power without a reference to the people, and by anti-Prohibitionists for varied reasons. One condition of the measure which has aroused strong opposition is the requirement of more than one-half of the votes cast at the forthcoming Provincial elections. For this reason many Prohibitionists despair of success, since the question will not call out nearly so large a vote as the elections will do.

With regard to the Referendum, there seems little doubt as to the issue. In view of the two plebiscites already taken, and the strong campaign inaugurated by the Dominion Alliance, of which Rev. W. A. Mackay, D.D., is president, there is good reason to believe that a large majority will be recorded in favor of prohibition.

The discoveries of the man of science, the researches of the scholar, the lore of the past, all are widely known through romances. 3. In these the actions of imaginary people give occasion for narrations of discoveries relative to men and things. 4. By means of solid treatise, by oral teaching, or by the exercise of elocutionary powers such things can rarely be brought to the tyro, or to any but those whose duty it is to learn them.

REVIEW

1. How is initial l usually written? 2. Give an illustration of each of the classes of outlines in which it is written differently? 3. How is final l usually written? 4. They Brighten the Home

Mrs. I. H. W., Mineral Wells, Tex., writes: "The pictures have been received and are all you claimed them to be. 'Inspiration,' and the 'Madonna and Child,' alone are worth the money paid, without including your valuable paper and the other pictures. I doubt if you could have brightened a home as easily in any other way as in the premiums selected."

A Magnificent Premium

J. G. B. H., St. Johnsbury, Vt., writes: "As an old subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I have often been the recipient of the many handsome premiums sent out to your subscribers. I therefore knew, when I heard that you were to send out an 'Art Portfolio' to your subscribers, that it would be something in keeping with the general tone of your paper, but I must confess that I had no realization of the value or beauty of the premium until I received the handsome Portfolio. I want to congratulate you on being able to send out such premiums, and I wish also to congratulate the subscribers for being able to obtain, at such a low subscription price, a paper of such par excellence."

In the Golden Summer

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

VACATION DAYS

IN a restaurant, the other day, I sat opposite several young people, evidently clerks, who were planning their summer vacation. In the large department stores for convenience sake, the vacation schedule is arranged early in the summer, and that portion of the force which is excused at a definite period must go then, unless amicable exchange can be effected with somebody else. A similar rule prevails in banks, and wholesale houses, wherever, indeed, people must accommodate one another. A week, ten days, or a fortnight is the ordinary vacation limit for business employees. Usually salaries go on during vacation, and quite often they are paid in advance before it, so that the holiday may be enjoyed with a full purse. An extension of the allotted vacation, even if secured by timely asking beforehand, is usually taken at the cost of the employee, the employer not paying wages or salary for a vacation that exceeds accustomed limits.

A person on salary should make vacation arrangements considerably earlier than the season of freedom. It is well to decide where one wants to go, whether singly, or with friends, and of course estimate carefully what one can afford to pay. For many reasons it is pleasanter to take a vacation in the company of friends. Only a very sorrowful, or very thoughtful, or very tired person wishes to go off and be solitary. Choose a place within two or three hours of home by rail or boat, if your means are small, then you will not spend too large a share of your funds on the mere traveling back and forth. All over our country there are delightful farmhouses where board is not extravagant, and which offer not only facilities for driving, fishing, exploring, bathing, and the like, but which open their hospitable doors and take you in, that you may have a right good time.

Do not have this time at the expense of somebody else. I do not mean in money. I am sure the young men and women who go forth in summer for a well-earned holiday have enough with them to pay their way, or else they would not go. I mean, do not forget the gentleness and restraints of a well-ordered home when you are boarding in an inn or a cottage. To go through corridors laughing, singing, jesting or racing, when elderly people or invalids, or mothers and babies have retired for the night, is selfish as well as in very bad form. Help the summer hostess by coming punctually to meals. Express appreciation of every courtesy, and be tolerant, if, in the height of the season, and in a crowded household, there are some demands made on your patience.

Find a good deal of your vacation delight in simple pleasures. Golf and tennis are agreeable diversions, but plain walking is not to be despised. Wear stout, serviceable clothes. A young girl should take with her for a fortnight's vacation, one short and one long skirt, a dainty silk waist, if she have one, a supply of wash waists, and a pretty lawn or muslin frock, with the needed underclothing for the holiday. Fine clothes are not so necessary as those which are fresh and neat. A trim and daintily clean-looking girl is more fascinating than an untidy one, who wears costly but messy finery.

Where is Gambling Learned?

Christian people, as a matter of course, condemn gambling, so does the law. By common consent, the gambler is regarded as a danger to the body politic, and gambling houses are carried on furtively, in defiance of municipal regulations and at the peril of those who keep and patronize them. It may be said tersely that "their steps take hold on hell."

A writer in The Herald and Presbyterian, recently made the assertion, quoting in its support the public testimony of a converted gambler, that gambling is not learned in dens of iniquity, but in homes where social card-playing is habitual. "The parlor game is the college where gamblers are educated." Parents will do well to consider this thing, and see whether they are willing to let their young sons and daughters play cards for amusement, or for charity, as many do.

A Wise Woman's Letter

DEAR MRS. M. R. F.—Your heartsome appeal to "Dear Aunt Prudence" for advice concerning the government of your fifteen-year-old daughter, has touched a responsive chord in my own heart, and I humbly submit the following considerations for your comfort:

The "independent spirit," which troubles you so much, is an element that enters nearly all young lives, where mental and physical conditions have firm foundations, and, if guided aright, will prove the basis of future good and success. While it may not long have been so evident as at present, yet it has been forming slowly but surely, just as each day and each year have slowly but surely been bringing your daughter to the full physical development of her age.

These changes in dispositions and physical conditions go hand in hand, and as the years increase the wise mother must watch each

Keep Cool!

THUS far the summer has been moderate, but heat and humidity are bound to come in their season. When the hot days are here, let us all keep cool. How?

By refraining from undue indulgence in heating and stimulating food. Too much meat is a prolific source of heat in the summer solstice. By keeping the table provided with appetizing cold dishes, by using fruits, vegetables and cereals, with milk and cream, and puddings made of farina, sago and similar light substances, instead of hot viands, which necessitate enormous fires in a coal-fed range.

Next, by thoroughly airing the house night and morning, and then closing windows and doors during the daytime, excluding the sun and the heated air.

Third, by wearing cool clothing. In Southern latitudes men have learned to dress in a style befitting the weather; to wear white linen instead of thick woolen clothes, and to avoid the sun. An umbrella is as necessary for a man as a parasol for a woman in a hot noonday.

Fourth, by avoiding alcoholic drinks. The person whose usual beverage is cold water, iced tea and iced coffee, is much safer than the one who indulges in wines and other intoxicants. Even soda water may be taken to excess; probably, however, the chief danger here is to small boys whose parents give them too much spending money.

Fifth, Keep cool by controlling your temper. Be not hasty to anger. Do not be easily irritated by trifles nor over impetuous; be not fretted by those small accidents which are the common lot. Ink spilled upon a floor, a grease spot on one's dress, a child's frock torn, a cherished cup broken or a saucer nicked, are all in a life-time, and there is no common sense in losing equanimity over such trifles. Emotions recklessly indulged in wear out the nervous strength that should last for a long, long day. To be a spendthrift of one's capital is very short-sighted, and conduces to greater evils than being uncomfortably hot in a day of the mounting thermometer.

Talking Shop

The expression is picturesque. It refers to making one's own business or avocation the common theme of conversation, and as we are supposed to choose our themes with reference to the largest happiness of our company, polite people do not talk shop. We try socially to discuss topics of general, not of personal interest, and above all, we never converse on any subject which is incomprehensible to others in the room. The financier who exploits the ups and downs of the stock market in a room full of women who do not know the alphabet of the matter, is talking shop. The author who cannot dwell on anything beyond his books and his short stories, and what they fetch and where he sells them, is talking shop. Even the mother who cannot divert the conversation from the wonderful achievements of her children, is talking shop. So is the invalid who will bring maladies and ailments to the front on every opportunity. Whatever you do, refrain from talking shop.

AUNT PRUDENCE PAYSON'S CATCH-ALL

—ALISON. Black and white, gray, lavender and lilac are worn in second mourning.

—MAMIE. Old people are often restless. Let your aged friend have all the freedom possible.

—CAGED. Wild birds do not like confinement. I would not cage a robin or a redbird.

—MOTHER. Babies are not rocked in these days; but as they have been for generations, rock yours if you want to.

—UNCERTAIN. The man who pays a girl assiduous attention, excluding others, for a long period, and who still does not ask her to marry him, is selfish or a flirt. There is no uncertainty about this.

—PUSS IN THE CORNER. Games of the old-fashioned variety are very pleasant as evening amusements. Stage-coach is an old favorite. But I think music and recitations better for a club programme.

FISHERFOLK OF HOLLAND REJOICING OVER THEIR QUEEN'S RECOVERY

Not long ago, Queen Wilhelmina of Holland was so ill that her life seemed to hang by a thread. The whole world was anxious about her, for have we not all watched her grow up from her fearless childhood to her present royal estate? But our solicitude was small compared to that of her subjects. Gentle and simple went wild with joy when Wilhelmina was out of danger, and the fisherfolk had a regular celebration, of which our picture gives an excellent idea.

phase, and, as far as possible, accommodate her own tastes to them, that she may hold and keep the confidence of her daughter. This seems like a great task to set before a mother with many cares, but if looked at in the right manner, the tasks may become pleasures. I speak from a past personal experience. During the years of a girl's life, from twelve to eighteen, when school and the consequent associations require so much time, it is easy for her to drift away from her mother's confidence, and then that mother needs to use fully as many innocent arts to win and hold this precious thing as she half unconsciously exerted when her husband was her lover. Her daughter is to be won by every gentle method in her power.

If this can be done, clandestine correspondence will take care of itself in so satisfactory a manner that mother will not need to fear for her daughter's discretion among new acquaintances.

If a daughter has acquaintances whom her mother do not know, remedy it at once. Make your daughter feel that her home is the place of all places, where she must receive the homage and attentions of her friends. I use the word "homage" advisedly, for I think our daughters must consider their own sweet womanhood worthy of homage, particularly from the sons of our nation, because in this, more than in any other way we may expect them to preserve unto themselves, purity in thought and deed.

If every mother who has the least doubt as to her daughter's judgment or discretion, could for twenty-four hours, see and know the thoughts, arguments, decisions and ambitions that pass through their minds and hearts, how many doubts and fears might be removed, and how many care-worn mothers might be lifted in thought from a quagmire of daily routine duties to a plane of sunshine and satisfaction.

Do not turn from these assertions with the thought that they claim too much. They are written with a pen dipped in a heart's blood, and they tell the tale of a life's experience.

Does not all this answer your question as to "intercepting a correspondence"? If not, let us remember that the same Book that says "Honor thy father and thy mother," says also, "Parents, provoke not thy children to wrath."

A Visit to the Outposts

AN EXTENDED TOUR OF THE GREAT WESTERN STATES TO PROMOTE CHURCH FEDERATION — By REV. E. B. SANFORD

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, belonging, as they do, to all denominations, will be interested in the report of an eye-witness of Christian work in a most interesting field, who has just returned from a two months' tour covering more than five thousand miles. One of the main purposes of this trip was to bring together in several States the honored men who have in charge the Home Mission and Church extension interests of leading denominations. It was a rare privilege to take counsel with these brethren in Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, South Dakota, Iowa and Nebraska. They are picked men, strong in physique and born to be leaders, because of qualities of head and heart and vision that have set them apart for service demanding rare gifts. Bring together these Baptist, Congregational, Presbyterian and other denominational superintendents of church work, with a good sprinkling of Methodist Presiding Elders, and you have a body of officials difficult to match in all the elements that make for strength in executive counsel and guidance. Many of them are veterans in service, and I can scarcely conceive of a narrative more thrilling than that which gathered into its pages incidents that have crowded the life-work of these men, whose annual journeys often measure miles more than sufficient to belt the globe. In all the States mentioned, these leaders not only expressed deep interest in the spirit and purpose of the work which The National Federation of Churches is seeking to advance, but gave their testimony as to the need of closer co-operative counsel and action in advancing the entire work of all the churches. With delightful unanimity of desire and purpose, steps were taken to secure the appointment of representatives from the denominational State bodies who, in conventions to be held later in the year, will decide as to permanent plans and methods of federation.

Federation does not contemplate organic union. It does not ask the churches to lay aside their denominational affiliations and obligations, but it does ask them to work together with other Christian churches to do the work of Christ more efficiently. It seeks to give practical expression to the spirit of Christian unity on the basis of fellowship with Christ in his mission to the world and in his intercessory prayer. It is an interdenominational movement that has already proved that co-operation can so unite the Christian forces and churches of a community that its power is irresistible.

It is not an uncommon thing to find half a dozen church organizations in towns where the population is less than a thousand. The result is deplorable. As a rule, the meagre salaries paid to the resident pastors is only made possible by gifts received from denominational missionary boards. In these church-ridden communities the struggle for existence engenders strife and division of forces. Sectarianism and not Christianity is the fruitage. Meanwhile, there is positive destitution in other communities, and a call for laborers comes from new and open fields. The heterogeneous character of the population, with differences of nationality that are marked by strong sectarian prejudices, makes the problem of meeting the spiritual need of these rural communities a very perplexing one. Is there any other way that these difficulties can be met than by advisory and federated action on the part of all the churches that hold to Christ as the head, and who recognize the unity that underlies their differences. In Milwaukee, Minneapolis, Omaha and other cities, it was our privilege to speak to the ministers in their union meetings regarding the need and possibilities of local federations. I was deeply impressed with the rare qualities of heart and brain that characterize the men now in pastoral charge of the leading churches in these great and still rapidly growing cities. Cultured, unassuming, but forceful in their personality, they are successfully meeting demands for service multifarious and exacting. They believe in the Gospel as the supreme remedy for all evils, and preach it in an earnest and faithful spirit. Federation is finding its strongest advocates among these ministers whose influence reaches out far beyond their local parishes.

A ride of a night and day from Kansas City brought us to Dallas, Tex. Our errand here was to bring a message from the National Federation to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. This is the highest representative body of the leading denomination in the Southland. Their gracious welcome and response to our message was gratefully appreciated. From Dallas to St. Louis and from there to Chicago, with meetings at Columbus and Pittsburg, brought to an end a trip that strengthened our conviction that the Church of Christ in this country is coming to a consciousness as never before of its unity and the need of federating its forces. Co-operation is to be the watchword of this twentieth century.

PUERTO RICO'S BIBLE DEPOSITORY

BIBLE work is progressing in our fair little island in the southern waters. It was an event in Puerto Rican history when the first Bible Depository of Puerto Rico was formally opened by the American Bible Society at No. 16 Santo Christo street, San Juan, last February. Nearly the entire body of missionaries residing at San Juan and Rio Piedras gathered at the depository to welcome and encourage the Society's agent, the Rev. Donald MacLaren, D.D., a retired chaplain of the United States Navy, who was appointed in the service early in the Civil War by President Lincoln. In his opening address, the Doctor affirmed his faith that God would bless this effort to spread his Truth in San Juan, if the Christian men and women assembled would faithfully do their part. Rev. Harry W. Jones, D.D., Chaplain of the United States Training Ship Monongahela, then lying at anchor in the bay, offered the opening prayer.

The Rev. Charles Drees, D.D., Superintendent of the Methodist Missions in Puerto Rico. Rev. H. P. McCormick, of the Baptist Church of San Juan and Rio Piedras, Rev. H. F. Richards, pastor of the Lutheran Church, Rev. M. Andujar, a native of Spain, in charge of the Methodist Spanish work in San Juan, and Rev. P. Van Fleet, of the English Methodist Service, took part in the service, declaring their joy at the coming of the open Bible to Puerto Rico, and their purpose to co-operate with Dr. MacLaren.

LITTLE HONG-A'S BRIGHT FAITH

HONG-A is a dear little girl, living in Tong-an, near Amoy, China. Her father died five years ago. She has been an invalid nearly ever since, and has now been more than one year on her back. She is very patient and cheerful, are just like Hagar and Ishmael; we are not wanted."

Not long since, her mother was laid up for several days with a painful poisoned hand. The child said: "We are now neither of us of any use. You have no hands and I have no feet."

Hong-a is very good to her two little brothers, and always tells them to be good. When a neighbor's little boy was screaming with anger, and was told that he "would be happier if he were good." Hong-a, who overheard this, said:

"That is true, but it is very hard to be good, and very easy to be bad." At another time, when her mother remarked to some one that perhaps Hong-a would always be an invalid, the child said: "If it is the will of the Heavenly Father, I will be glad to bear it."

A friend in New York sent out a box of dolls, one of which was given to Hong-a. She prizes it very much. When I saw her last, I asked if she would let me take her photograph. She seemed much pleased and sat up just long enough to be taken, and then was carried back to bed. I enclose a copy of the photograph of her and her mother.

HONG-A AND HER MOTHER and her neighbor says she never complains.

If Hong-a's parents had been heathen, they would probably have given her to the beggars, or have allowed her to have died from neglect, there are so many poor neglected children in China. But Hong-a's mother is a Christian. She was once a pupil in our girls' boarding-school. She is very fond of her little invalid daughter, and takes good care of her. A relative has often scolded the mother because she is so good to the child. He says, "Why do you take care of her? She will never be of any use, and had better die." The little girl once said to her mother, "We

Hong-a does not like to be behind the children who study in school, and has asked Miss Zwemer to come often to hear her lessons, which she prepares by herself. She can read very well and knows many of the Bible stories. She said to her mother: "What makes the missionaries so kind to me?" She does not know that her happy little face has taught lessons to more than one missionary who has visited her.

Hong-a is one of the Good Shepherd's little lambs. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

THE DIVINE IDEA OF SUCCESS

SO much is said and written concerning success in life, nowadays, that is based on a false apprehension of what success really is, that it is refreshing to turn to a little pamphlet by the Rev. Charles M. Sheldon*, in which the Topeka pastor gives the spiritual definition of success in words that all may understand. He writes:

God wants men to succeed; he wants them to grow great; but the common definition of success in the world is a different conception from God's definition. What is "success," according to the definition of God, not according to the definition of men?

First, success means doing the will of God first, before anything else. Christ defined it when he said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things" (that is, the physical blessings, food, raiment, earthly power) "shall be added unto you."

The first great object of human life is not to make money or build cities or organize railroads or manufacture goods; but the primary object of all humanity is to do the will of God. It may make money or lose it; it may build cities or it may not; it may manufacture goods at gain or at loss in obedience to this command; but obedience to the command is imperative if one is going to win good success in the world.

Yet we must understand at the beginning that, if we undertake to obey this law of God, we shall be counted eccentric or queer or even fools by very many, because by the worldly standard the great achievement in the world is getting on in physical ways first.

We have become so accustomed to measure up success by a man's position, almost without reference to the ways in which he has gained it, that even Christian people are in the habit of thinking a man is a success because he lives in a fine house, has money in the bank, wears good clothes, and is an educated, cultured man. He may be the greatest failure in the whole city as a human being, for it is eternally true, as Jesus said, that a man's real life does not consist in the abundance of things which he possesses.

Two great principles lie at the foundation of life. The first is the great corner-stone of all, the principle of doing God's will first, instead of our own; and the second is living up to the laws of God as we find them governing our bodies and our minds. But after these principles have been put into the life so that they are as easy and natural for us as the breathing of a healthy physical nature, then we shall come to understand that good success in the world means giving the world some real advice. No man has a right to live in this world without adding his part to its happiness, its comfort, and its betterment. Gladstone said, in one of his best speeches on labor, "In all God's creation there is no place open for the idle, wealthy man." Dr. Lyman Abbott, in his fine volume entitled, Christianity and Social Progress, says: "Every man is bound by the gifts of health, intelligence, capacity, and opportunity, which God has given him, to put into the world at least as much as he takes out of it."

We have come upon evil times indeed, if the one greatest standard of success among men is making money instead of giving service. I visited a large and beautiful city, and one of the citizens drove me through the resident portion of the place, pointing out the fine houses. He knew the names of nearly all the people who lived in these residences, and would say as we drove along, "That is Mr. So-and-So's house; he is said to be worth half a million." "This is Millionaire Blank's house; he owns the factories we passed six blocks below here." This is Senator Somebody's house; he has the finest stable of horses in the place." Finally I began to ask Mr. So-and-So made his money, and the answer came rather reluctantly, "Well, to tell the truth, he made most of it, I suppose, in speculation."

"How did that man make his money?" I asked, as we went by what he said was the finest mansion in the city.

"Well, he made his money principally through inheritance; his father left him a large fortune."

"What does he do?" I said.

"He doesn't do anything to speak of." The owner of the next house, a splendid specimen of architecture, had made most of his money in ways which were at least questionable, if not almost criminal; and yet these men were pointed to with pride as persons of success in the world. Is it not about time that the thoughtful young men and women of America began to ask, "What is success?"

PROPER FOOD

Better Than Ocean Breezes.

It makes a lot of difference in hot weather, the kind of food one eats.

You can keep the body cool if you breakfast on Grape-Nuts, for in its pre-digested form, it presents the least resistance to the digestive organs and contains as much nutriment as heavy body heating food such as meat, potatoes, etc.

Grape-Nuts is probably entitled to the claim to be the most perfectly adapted food for human needs now extant. The meat eater and vegetarian are alike, charmed with its crisp taste, the delicate flavor of the grape-sugar and the nourishment to body and brain while the housewife is attracted by its being thoroughly cooked at the factory and obtained from the grocer ready for instant use with the addition of cream, making it a cool, delicious dish, requiring no hot stove and cross cook on a hot morning.

When Grape-Nuts and Postum Food Coffee constitute the summer breakfast with the addition of a little fruit, it is not necessary to seek the ocean breezes for comfort, for external heat is unnoticed when internal coolness from proper food is felt. The recipe book in each package of Grape-Nuts gives dozens of delicious dishes.

HERE could be no doubt that Winch was crazed with passion. He had realized by costly experience how severe was the loss he had sustained in the death of his wife, and, having convinced himself that if it had not been for Immanuel, she might have been living still, he was resolved on revenge. Turning fiercely on Hilda, he said:

"Ye little, lyin', white-faced, meechin critter you! you'd ought to git yer neck broke!" He raised his heavy whip; it descended, shattering a fragile china inkstand; the ink spread over the dainty appointments of the table and dripped slowly on to the carpet. Hilda was stirred out of her frozen terror to sudden wrath by the sight.

"You—you horrid old man!" she cried. "Just see what you have done to my new carpet!"

"Oh, that's the way the wind sets?" sneered Winch, with an ugly laugh. "I've got plenty of time, an' I guess afore I polish you off I'll touch up some of this 'ere prop'ty of 'Manuel's at I see lyin' round permisc'ous like."

Hilda was sure he was crazy now as she watched the heavy whip descend again and again, smashing, defacing article after article all over the pretty room. She grew cold and faint at the thought of that terrible whip crashing down upon her head and shoulders. The thought suggested a fresh reprieve. "You've spoiled everything in this room," she cried; "but don't you dare to touch my china dishes!"

The destroyer had paused to stare about him with vacant eyes. "Your chiny dishes!" he yelled. "I don't ask no better fun!"

Hilda watched his shambling figure as he lounged slowly across the room. "Chiny dishes," he was muttering. "I'll fix 'em!" He burst into a loud laugh as he flung open a door into the dining-room, where a sideboard sparkling with glass and silver met his gaze. "You stan' right whar you be till I git through out here," he growled, turning to Hilda, who still covered behind the table. "I'll ten' to your case pretty quick now!" Then the lust of destruction laid hold on him.

Amid the crash of glass and china and the splintering shock of breaking furniture she gained the stair, and fled unperceived to her own room, where she locked herself in, pulling a heavy bureau across the door by way of further defence. "What shall I do!" she wailed. "Oh, Immanuel! Immanuel!"

The faint rattle of wheels caught her ears as she stood looking distractedly about her. After a moment's hesitation she crept out of the open window and stood erect on the roof of the veranda.

History is said to repeat itself now and again. As Hilda strained eyes and ears for a recurrence of the sound, a long narrow wagon hove into view from behind a clump of trees. The driver of the slow-stepping white horse sat stiffly erect in the driver's place; occasionally he cast a guarded glance at the shrouded shape which constituted his load.

"Won't you stop, please!" cried the girl, waving a handkerchief scarce whiter than her face, as the wagon crawled slowly past the gate. She repeated her cry again and again with shrill emphasis. To her immense relief the man lifted his head, and with a startled exclamation pulled up his horse.

Hilda watched him eagerly as he walked up the graveled path. "Excuse me, miss," he said, staring up at her, "did you call me?"

"Yes," said Hilda, breathlessly; "I am all alone, and there is a man downstairs spoiling all my things? Can't you make him stop?"

"Why—why—why! What did I understand you to say? A man—an' spoiling all your things. What man?"

"His name is Winch," said Hilda; "he is crazy, I know. Can't you make him stop?"

"Very singular case, I'm sure," returned the man, lifting his eyebrows perplexedly. "I am the corner of this 'ere deestrick—name Dunder—also undertaker. I was engaged in taking an extry fine—A No. 1—casket over to Turner's Crossroads. Winch, you say; not 'Rastus Winch of the Corners, I trust. What did you tell me your name was?"

"My name is Rossi," said Hilda. "Oh, never mind anything else you have to do; my husband will pay you. Don't leave me alone, please!"

"Rossi?—yes, yes!" said Mr. Dunder, rubbing his hands together. "Your husband was, so to speak, the prop'ty of 'Rastus Winch at one time. He never got over parting with him, 'Rastus didn't; a singular man—very." He advanced cautiously and looked in through a nearby window.

"Can you see him?" inquired Hilda, anxiously.

"Why, yes," replied Mr. Dunder, backing cautiously away. "He seems to be looking for something—or somebody. It is 'Rastus Winch, I regret to say. Perhaps if you should come down, you might persuade him to—"

"No, I'll never come down while he's there; you must get him away."

Mr. Dunder looked thoughtfully at his beast, which stood drooping its lean head dispiritedly toward the muddy road. "I guess it would 'bout square the account," he muttered to himself. With that he started toward the gate.

"Don't leave me!" pleaded Hilda, from above. "I'm afraid he's coming up—oh!" She finished with a little shriek at the sound of a heavy crash from below.

"I'll git him out all right," said Mr. Dunder, reassuringly. "I'm going to try a little strategy on 'Rastus. 'You'll see!"

A brown horse attached to a light wagon stood near the fence, daintily nibbling the lilac bushes with long, outstretched neck. Mr. Dunder fustily guided this animal into the road, then, giving him a slash with his whip, which sent him shambling down the hill, he returned to the house, his flabby face purple with exertion. "'Rastus," he called, pounding lustily on the broken window-sash with his whip-handle. "I say, 'Rastus! Guess you better come out and look arter your prop'ty. I see your hoss an' wagon is runnin' away towards the Corners!"

A big, towlsed head appeared in answer to this summons, and later Winch hurried himself from the wide-flung door. He stopped an instant to stare after the rattling vehicle, for the horse had gathered in the lust of freedom as he went, and was running as fast as his ancient legs could carry him. Swept along by the suddenly diverted torrent of his wrath, the old man set off at a brisk pace after the runaway, shouting: "Whoa, thar, you perverse critter—whoa!"

Mr. Dunder had climbed into his own vehicle by this time. He turned his solemn eyes upward to where Hilda still crouched upon the veranda roof. "He won't come back," he said, in a tone of satisfaction; "he'll be too busy a-lickin' of his hoss when he ketches him!" As he drove away, he glanced guardedly at the shrouded shape behind. "Accounts is squared betwixt her an' me," he muttered. "An old debt, but well paid; b'sides, she didn't fin' no fault—roomy an' stylish."

The languid current of his thoughts was broken by the approach of a phaeton driven at a brisk pace by a handsome young man, whose dark eyes rested upon him with a glimmer of recognition.

"How de do, Mr. Rossi," shouted Dunder, pulling up his willing animal. "Say! I guess you're wanted to home! I jest succeeded in gettin' our friend 'Rastus Winch out o' your residence, where he was cuttin' a pretty broad swath a-smashin' furnitur' an' dishes. Your wife hollered to me to come in an' help. She was scared mos' to death, I guess."

The bronzed face of the listener had blanched to a curious dusky pallor during these utterances. He touched his horse sharply with the whip and plunged ahead

"Say, I like that!" exclaimed the undertaker. "I s'pose I could send in a little bill for professional—I mean for services; but I won't. We'll call it square betwixt his ma an' me."

There was no need of perfunctory tears on this occasion—if Hilda had ever indulged in such! The limpid drops gushed in unrestrained torrents from the sweet blue eyes, drenching the velvety cheeks, which now resembled drowned white roses. The wrecked house told its own story, and the disjointed little sentences which fell from Hilda's trembling lips told the rest.

Immanuel said little, but he wrapped the slight figure close in his arms, his heart beating loud passionate throbs in the exquisite little ear which lay against it.

"I can't—can't bear to—to stay here any longer!" she sobbed. "I—I could never be—happy here again! May n't—we go away—please?"

He stooped to kiss the white forehead under its fluff of yellow hair. "Will you forgive me, Hilda?" he begged. "Can you forgive me?" His voice was broken with something like a sob. The thought of the fair shoulders and dimpled arms of his young wife scored with the red scars of that merciless whip filled him with a mixture of pain and fury.

Hilda lifted her eyes to his quivering face with a flash of comprehension. "He might have killed me!" she murmured. "You might have found me lying dead—right there!" She pointed dramatically to the ruins of the pretty room and buried her face against the loud-beating heart.

"Oh, Hilda!" he groaned. "I ought not to have left you here! We ought not to have stayed. You never liked it. You poor, poor girl—what a selfish brute I have been! And to think what might have happened! I—" He stopped short, and two big hot tears splashed on her white hand.

There is something terrible in the hard-wrung tears of a strong man. Hilda was silent for a moment with something like awe. Then the clamorous self within urged that this was the long-sought opportunity for conquest. "You will take me away, dear?" she said plaintively, yielding her pliant body to his remorseful embraces. "You will not ask me to stay here. I could not forget that—that terrible face!"

"Anywhere that you like, Hilda!" he cried, reckless of the future. "I have made a foolish blunder which might have had terrible consequences. You shall choose our home, dear."

She looked at him intently, light and color dawning in eyes and cheeks. "Do you really mean it?" she murmured.

He hesitated for an instant. "You will remember my life-work, Hilda," he said, almost beseechingly.

She shrugged her shoulders with a charming little pout. "You ought to be where the work is," she said boldly. "How do you know whether the men you hire are doing as you would like? We will go to New York."

A man is in a hard case when his wife, to whom he has vowed life-long love and devotion, and his most cherished ideal, pull him in opposite directions. The problem has been met and solved in as many ways as there are men to face it. In the conversation that followed, Immanuel Rossi once more attempted to draw the woman of his choice into comprehension of, and sympathy with his plans. "It is true," he said, "that if we choose to spend his money which has come to me, upon ourselves, we may live in a palace—in a dozen palaces; we may shine with jewels, and devour the living of a thousand of our fellow-beings."

"How disagreeable you put it," she cried. "If we use our own as we like, how do we wrong anyone else?"

"But, dearest," he urged, "I have told you already that this money has been taken from the poor in a score of ways—all of them dishonest, as I count honesty, and I must give it back. Once for all, Hilda, I will tell you that I believe no man has a right to snatch for himself what belongs to his brothers. There ought to be no millionaires and no paupers in this age of the world's enlightenment."

Fine scorn crept into the blue eyes. "You are no better than an anarchist then!" she said, her lips curling in a malicious little smile. "Shall we march, and carry a red flag, and let our hair grow long?" Then reading her blunder in his amazed eyes, she threw her arms about his neck and burst into fresh sobs. "I hardly know what I am saying," she faltered. "I am not—able to talk any more."

Whereat he inwardly cursed himself for a selfish brute, and devoted himself afresh to the task of soothing her.

Hudson, from New Jersey and elsewhere like to picnic around Mont-Lawn on the Fourth and see the children on their gala-day. Overworked mothers from the city come up sometimes. And our children like to share their cream with their friends and invite them to the fireworks.

It is a tired, happy crowd which seeks at last the dormitories after a full day of delights. It had been a morning of eager questionings about the wonderful Fourth, reports of which seemed too good for belief. If rain had not interfered, promises have all been fulfilled; only once or twice in the history of the Home, has the Fourth been other than smiling; then pleasures were only deferred. Everything is done at Mont-Lawn that children whose lives have been subject to so much suffering and deprivation elsewhere, may know no unnecessary disappointment there. From dawn till dark, Housemother Collins and her corps of devoted helpers labor faithfully that the children may be well and happy, and led in paths of righteousness.

Distant friends aid us, too, in this blessed work. Some are supporting cots for the season; others contribute money to send one or more children to the Home; $21 sustains a cot; $3 gives one waif a ten days' outing; $6 sends two; $9 three; $36 twelve, and so on. Children—many pale, thin and ragged—through the Bible House, pleading for outings. Will you help us send them to Mont-Lawn? It means a chance for life to some. Cash contributions should be addressed to this paper; garments to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

Flowers in the Market-Place

ONE of every city's most attractive features is its flower-markets, florists' windows and flower-stands. "Beauty goes cheap at ten cents a bunch," said a lady, as she handed a dime to a little lad who was crying fragrant wares at the foot of an Elevated station. Beauty does not always go so cheap. Only in summer time are blossoms in reach of slender purses. "What we enjoy we make our own, whether we can buy it or no," some sage declared. By this rule all may possess the treasures of the florists' window.

The Flower Market at Thirty-fourth Street Ferry, New York, has doubtless given as much pleasure to impecunious toilers hurrying by as to the rich who paused to purchase. In its season, Union Square Flower Market has been the delight of early risers of all conditions. The rich lady's "fad" was to come down in the dewy morning and drive off with almost a flower-garden blooming around her in her carriage. Peddlers who had brought plants in wagons, push-carts, and all sorts of conveyances, had heavier purses and lighter hearts because she had purchased freely. And often the beauty and fragrance for which she had exchanged her gold went to gladden weary eyes in hospitals, or to fill the hands of flower mission workers who labor to brighten the lives of the poor. Flowers in the market-place! it is well we find there such gentle ministers of grace and love.

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. THE MEANS OF GROWTH*

An Object of Christian Ambition Worthy all his Effort Which he is Helped to Attain

ONE of the most familiar phrases of our time is that of "the strenuous life." Especially in this country have we realized what those words mean. The keen, eager, alert, energetic character of life in these days, and in this land, impresses every one. On the streets, in the banks, offices and stores, one sees on the faces of men traces of the intensity of the struggle that absorbs their thoughts and energies. Never was there a time when men seemed to have so entirely quitted the ruts, and to have devoted themselves to new and original methods. The conviction that there are great prizes to be won, and that they will be won by the swift and the strong, has taken possession of people's minds, and stimulated them to vigorous effort. That the prizes they seek are worthy of the effort, they do not appear to doubt, yet there are events occurring on all hands which might well cause many of them to pause. Those who are seeking wealth, or fame, or power, may see around them men who have succeeded in the same race, and have found the prize disappointing. Success has not yielded the satisfaction that they expected to have derived from it. Mere possession cannot insure happiness, but may tend, on the other hand, to increase care and multiply anxieties. Whatsoever be the prize that a man sets himself to win, if it be something that he can only hold or use, he is sure to find it disappointing.

A very different object of the strenuous life is that which the apostle describes in the passage associated with the topic. His description of his own experience is like that of our own time. He has not attained; he is reaching forth and is pressing toward the mark for a prize. There we have the strenuous life. But the prize is different. He does not seek to have, but to be. He desires to become the kind of man that was Christ's ideal for him when he was converted. He was apprehended or called for a purpose. He is anxious that that purpose be fulfilled. Whatsoever may be Christ's standard of attainment, Paul feels that he was called to reach it. He wants to learn what it is, and is striving with all his might to attain it. He is not perfect; he is sure of that; he does not pride himself on the progress he has made; but is reaching forward to more sublime heights and ever striving to reach them. Every step gained, is a stepping-stone to some greater elevation which God is to reveal to him. The avowal is significant, coming from a man so eminent, an old man and a prisoner, in imminent peril of execution.

How many Christians are there leading such a strenuous life? How many there are who look back to their conversion as an accomplished fact, with which they may be content! Their sins pardoned through faith in Christ, there remains nothing more to be desired. That is not the Christian spirit. Pardon and regeneration are conferred for a purpose. They are the beginning, not the end of Christ's dealing with his people. He wishes them to become meet or fit "to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light."

That is a wonderful ambition. How little we realize in what that fitness consists! Some of its characteristics Paul mentions. Fruitfulness in good works; increased knowledge of God; greater spiritual power and more patience, joy and gratitude—these attainments are part of the fitness he desires to reach. He implies that they can be gained only by such effort as men put into worldly pursuits. As with them, he would have Christians study and strive and labor, and assures them that they will have help from God. Christ's purpose in saving them being the development of spiritual character, he comes to the assistance of everyone who seeks such development. The very desire is a call on him for help which he never fails to answer. The way of growth may be dim at the outset, but the man who dwells on the character of Christ, as it is revealed in the Gospels, who seeks to be like him, gets new light daily; he is gradually changed into the same character. As we can never truly admire and love a human being without coming to resemble him, so the love of Christ transforms a man. Earnest prayer, constant vigilance, complete dependence on divine power—by these means Christ's purpose is realized of a character fit for the eternal inheritance.

MIDSUMMER STARS

smaller stars attending it at a respectful distance, one on each side.

To the left of Aquila is seen the curious figure of Delphinus, the Dolphin, sometimes called "Job's Coffin," while below and to the right, toward the south, a very bright part of the Milky Way is filled with small clusters of stars and knots of nebulosity.

The central sky in the south, above Scorpio and below Hercules, is occupied by the shapeless and hopelessly entangled constellations of Ophiuchus and Serpens. The head of the great serpent, which Ophiuchus is represented as bearing in his hands, appears in the form of an irregular letter "X," just underneath the Northern Crown.

Readers who learn the stars and constellations contained in our chart, can watch their gradual westward movement during the later summer, those shown near the western horizon in the chart sinking from sight behind the hills, while in the east others arise. At 11 p. m., in the middle of July, 10 p. m., on the 1st of August, and 9 p. m., in the middle of August, the brilliant star Vega will be found almost directly overhead, the great square of Pegasus will be hanging by one corner in the northeast, and the silvery scarf of the Milky Way will pass close to the zenith, stretching clear across from the northern to the southwestern horizon. Antares will then be far west of the meridian, while Aquarius and Pisces will be rising in the east.

THE LORD WITH US

NOT upward to the arching skies,
Gleaming with lights of gold,
Do we need turn to seek the Lord
His presence to behold.

Nor round us seek Thee in Thy works.

Of wisdom, beauty and love,
Reflecting still with myriad rays
The gold lights from above.

Thou art within us: to our lives

With loving presence come,
Seeking the lowly, trusting heart,
To make Thyself a home!

Coffee's Weight on Old Age.

When prominent men realize the injurious effects of coffee and the change in health that Postum can bring, they are glad to lend their testimony for the benefit of others.

Mr. C. C. Wright, superintendent of public schools in North Carolina, says:—"My mother, since her early childhood, was an inveterate coffee drinker and had been troubled with her heart for a number of years and complained of that 'weak all over' feeling and sick stomach."

Some time ago, I was making an official visit to a distant part of the country and took dinner with one of the merchants of the place. I noticed a somewhat peculiar flavor of the coffee, and asked him concerning it. He replied that it was Postum Food Coffee. I was so pleased with it, that after the meal was over, I bought a package to carry home with me, and had wife prepare some for the next meal; the whole family were so well pleased with it, that we discontinued coffee and used Postum entirely.

I had already been at times very anxious concerning my mother's condition, but we noticed that after using Postum for a short time, she felt so much better than she did prior to its use, and had little trouble with her heart and no sick stomach; that the headaches were not so frequent, and her general condition much improved. This continued until she was as well and hearty as the rest of us.

I know Postum has benefited myself and the other members of the family, but not in so marked a degree as in the case of my mother, as she was a victim of long standing."

DUTY THROUGH LOVE

Obedience Inspired by Divine Affection

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE object of the death of Christ was that the holy law of our duty to God and to man "might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit" (Rom. 8: 4). "Christ died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again" (II. Cor. 5: 15). Christ died for us, not only that his disinterested death for us should appeal to us to live disinterested lives; but that he might empower us by his poured-out life, imparted to us by faith, to live out in our lives his own unselfish life.

How impossible it is to force ourselves to love! We can force ourselves to think, to speak, to act; but love does not spring up at our bidding. Unless there is something which appeals to us and touches our inmost heart, we cannot love. None can love an unknown God; none can, by his own power, love an uncongenial human being. "But God commended his own love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5: 8). Let us realize it; let us compare this wondrous love with our selfish human hearts, and we sink in shame before this love of God to his enemies. And it is written to them that believe, and who therefore are justified by faith (Rom. 8: 1). "The love of God hath been shed abroad in our hearts through the Holy Ghost which was given us" (Rom. 5: 5). In this love, not in our love, but his love in us, let us consider the second table of God's holy commandments, and know that by imparted love we can, we must, we will obey them.

Our first duty to man, enjoined in the Ten Commandments, touches those with whom we have first to do, and to whom, under God, we owe our life—our father and mother. The first friction we have in life is when our will is crossed by our parents. It is our duty and our gain to yield them obedience. Adam and Eve sinned through disobedience, and God provides that in our earliest years, if we have parents who respect their children enough to take the trouble to control them, we may have a discipline which is costly, invaluable, for our future life. A child who is unrestrained in early life is the loser for it throughout his whole life. "My son," writes the wisest man who ever lived, "keep the commandment of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother; bind them continually upon thine heart; tie them about thy neck." (Prov. 6: 20-22).

And this commandment is spoken of in connection with holiness: God said, through Moses, to Israel, "Ye shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy. Ye shall fear every man his mother, and his father, and ye shall keep my Sabbath. I am Jehovah." (Lev. 19: 2, 3, R. V.). Thus we know that in God's eyes no man is holy who neglects, disobeys, or dishonors in any way, his father or his mother. Again, God gave a special blessing to the Rechabites, because they obeyed the commandment of Johnadab their father (Jer. 35: 18, 19). The Lord Jesus condemns severely the sophistry of those who, in the days he was on earth, evaded their responsibility to maintain their parents, by the excuse that the money was a gift given to God; and he told them they made void the Word of God by their tradition (Matt. 15: 4-6; Mark 7: 8-13). This command has a special promise annexed to it, and the apostle Paul thus mentions it: "Children, obey your parents in the Lord; for this is right. Honor thy father and mother [which is the First Commandment with promise], that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth" (Eph. 6: 1-3, R. V.). We might trace in families that this is so.

"Thou shalt do no murder!" is the second commandment of the second table. Our thoughts go back to Cain, the first murderer, when the voice of his slain brother's blood cried to God from the ground, and the awful sentence went forth: "Cursed art thou from the ground which hath opened its mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand" (Gen. 4: 8-12). Alas! the murder-spirit spread, until "the earth was filled with violence" (Gen. 6: 11), and after the judgment of the flood, God made a law, and said, "Surely your blood, the blood of your lives, will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man, even at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God made he man" (Gen. 9: 5, 6). But our Lord shows that anger in the heart also breaks this commandment, and shows that our safety is in a prompt reconciliation when our brother has aught against us. He does not enter into the thought of what we may have against him, for he teaches us to love our enemies (Matt. 5: 21-26).

Question of the Week

Jeanne d'Arc, Florence Nightingale, Richelieu and Dante

First, would be Jeanne d'Arc, to ascertain by what mysterious power a simple maiden can revive a dying nation. Next, Florence Nightingale could impress one with the beauty of life when lived by the pure in heart. Of the men, Armand Richelieu stands first, who, using both steel and straw, bound his beloved country to a steadfast course while all Europe was in turmoil. Then the sad and exiled Dante might teach one to translate misery into music. These, while not the greatest, nor perhaps the best, are the ones I would most desire to meet, because they have so clearly expounded lessons which the world still needs to learn in order to appreciate the sublime possibilities of life.

ROBERT MACBURNAY.

Mrs. Browning, Mrs. Stowe, Luther and Tennyson

I should wish to see, of women, Mrs. Browning and Mrs. Stowe. Mrs. Browning, because her genius as a poet, her character as one of the loveliest of women, her position as wife of a poet still greater than herself—all make her the most interesting woman of this, perhaps of any age. Mrs. Stowe, because I so admire and venerate her as author of a book that helped give freedom to a race. Of men, Martin Luther and Alfred Tennyson. Luther, because I am so grateful for what we owe him, even the vast, aggressive sisterhood of Protestant churches that exists to-day; and because he was as simple, lovable and good, as he was great. Tennyson, because he seems to me the poetic flower of nineteen centuries.

AMELIA HOYT.

E. S. Phelps, Phoebe Palmer, McCheyne and Samuel Rutherford

I would rather meet E. Stuart Phelps, author of my favorite book, The Gates Ajar, Phoebe Palmer, the author of some consecration hymns and a leader in the holiness movement in America. Of all men living or dead, first comes Robert Murray McCheyne. Then I would meet Samuel Rutherford. I love them and their writings as I do nothing else apart from the Bible. They inspire and Jeanne d'Arc, who was burned alive in 1431. William Tyndal and John Frith, who bravely opposed the people when convinced that it was right to do so. Frith was burned at the stake in 1533. Tyndal translated the New Testament into English, and although a bishop purchased and destroyed the first edition, Tyndal had courage to print a second edition and translated the Pentateuch. He was imprisoned eighteen months, and burned alive in 1536.

HELEN BROCKETT.

Harriet Beecher Stowe, Helen Gould, Caesar and Beethoven

It would, indeed, be a pleasure to meet a person who, judging from her life's work, must have been so noble, good and brave. How strong her sense of right and justice, when others faltered! How far-reaching her pen! Forever in the heart of every son of the black race is a monument enduring forever to the memory of Harriet Beecher Stowe. The other woman I would most like to meet is Helen Gould. She is not only beautiful and rich, but noble and good. Moreover, she thrill my whole being as no other writers ever have.

MRS. E. RISDON.

Catharine the Great, Queen Elizabeth, Aristotle and Shakespeare

Of all the women who have ever lived, I should like most to have met, first, Catharine the Great, of Prussia; the greatest woman who ever sat upon a throne. Second, Queen Elizabeth, of England, whose strong will, indomitable courage and political tact are unsurpassed by any other woman. Then, of all the men, I should like most to have met, first, Aristotle, "the master of those who know." The philosopher, who for nearly twenty centuries ruled over the realm of mind with a despotic sway. Second, Shakespeare, the greatest of all dramatists, who knew more about human nature than any other man that ever lived.

J. E. KIRSCHMAN.

Anastasia, Joan of Arc, Tyndal and Frith

The four characters whom I should like to have met were among the vast number of Christian Martyrs who underwent suffering willingly, unhesitatingly, without retracting, concealing, or prevaricating. Anastasia lived in 303 A.D., and was brought up by her Christian mother. She was treated harshly by her husband, a Roman Knight, when he discovered she was a Christian. At his death, Anastasia devoted herself to the study of the Scriptures, and spent her fortune endeavoring to relieve the Christians in prisons. She was arrested, and at her refusal to sacrifice to idols was exiled to the Island of Palmaria, then brought back to Rome and burned alive.

is patriotic—her patriotism displaying itself not merely in erecting expensive buildings and monuments, but in a common love for all humanity, which alone is true patriotism. As I cast my mind back over the events and acts of men that have formed history, two stand pre-eminently first. The man who "came, saw and conquered," is one of these. Even now, to look at a picture of that imperial moulded clay, portraying strength of character such as man has never since shown, one must think that it was indeed true "to be a Roman was to be greater than a king." The other man was neither a great writer, orator, or statesman, yet his work will live in its power for good as long as civilization sweeps onward with its mighty march. The soul-lifting music of Beethoven will ever lift man to a higher, nobler life. CLARA CARPENTER.

Eve and His Own Mother

I would like most of all to meet Eve, with all her sainted offspring around her. Imagine her joy as she greets one after another in rapid succession. She is wiser now than in Eden, and more beautiful. When my work on earth is done, let me meet Eve, after God's welcome is received. Next, I would meet my own sainted mother.

A. W. LEWIS.

Queen Mary, Victoria, Alexander the Great and Lincoln

Of all women I would choose to see Mary, Queen of Scots, and Queen Victoria, the best queen that ever sat upon a throne and the one most beloved by her people. Of men, I would choose to see Alexander the Great, the man who, at the age of thirty-two, was lord of the greater part of the then known world. For the second man I would choose to see Abraham Lincoln, the preserver of the Union and emancipator of the slaves.

Miscellaneous Questions

Christian Eadeavor, Portland, Me. The question came up in discussion among a company of young people, whether the soul of an infant comes like the body, by natural birth, or whether God puts in every child a soul directly from his own hand by creative power. Can you tell me what is the general belief?

The subject has been debated for generations, with varying results. The belief is now becoming more prevalent, especially among biological students, that the soul is transmitted from the parents. There are constitutional traits, predisposition to forms of sin, peculiarities of disposition, etc., which so strongly remind an observer of the character of the parents that it is difficult to escape the belief that the soul is transmitted like the body. There are, too, children, who early in life show such perversity and tendency to evil that it seems almost blasphemous to attribute their souls directly to God's creative power.

Mrs. Hattie A. A., Burt, Ia. Is the production of the Passion Play at Oberammergau to be classed with the recent presentation at Montreal?

No. The play as produced in Switzerland, although the whole proceeding is repugnant to Western Christians, was really a solemn ceremonial—a survival of ages—and the leading participants, it is generally understood, were selected with a special view to their moral character. Yet, it seems worse than impious for any one to assume the part of Christ. On the other hand, the productions at Montreal and elsewhere were simply money-making spectacles wholly irreverent, and to most minds, even blasphemous.

Inquirer, Holly Springs, Miss. Did the death of Stephen have anything to do with the conversion of the Apostle Paul?

It may have made an impression on his mind. He must have been astonished to see a believer in Christ suffer death with so much equanimity and triumphant confidence. The magnanimity of Stephen's dying words must surely have touched his heart and conscience. There appears, however, to have been nothing like conversion as a result. On the contrary, it is explicitly stated that after Stephen's death, Saul made havoc of the Church (Acts 8: 3), and he was on his way to persecute the Christians of Damascus when his conversion occurred. Obviously, therefore, Stephen's death had not diminished his hatred of Christianity and so could not have led to his conversion.

Emily H. S., Asbury, N. J., writes: I have noticed a question in THE MAIL-BAG, relating to the casting out of nines. May I, as an old teacher, explain more definitely? It was often used to prove an example in multiplication, and I always found it to be the shortest and truest way. Let me give an example: 8, 6, 3, 7, 2 added = 26, cast out 9 and remainder is 8. 8, 6, 3, 7, 2 added = 26, cast out 9 and 6 remains. Multiply remainders 8 x 6 = 48. Cast out 9 and 3 remains. Now add the product and cast out 9. If 3 remains, the answer is correct. If not, it is incorrect.

Toronto's Model Rescue Mission

A Religious and Benevolent Work that Reaches 50,000 of the Homeless and Churchless Every Year

NEARLY six years ago, a little band of earnest men began a work for Christ in Toronto, Canada. At first they operated in a very humble way, visiting, with a Gospel wagon, those parts of the city in which the homeless and friendless might be encountered. Among the crowds to which they brought the message of life, were many who rarely, if ever, heard the Gospel in a church, and whose circumstances and surroundings practically debarred them from spiritual privileges. They belonged to the great army of the churchless and the neglected, whose legions are to be met in nearly every populous city on this continent.

After a time, Mr J. C. Davis, the leader in the Toronto enterprise, and his associates, became convinced that a headquarters was needed for the work, and a store at No. 235 Yonge Street was hired. From the first service there, the audiences crowded the hall, so that it quickly became evident that the work would soon outgrow it. A year later, in May, 1897, another and much larger building was rented on the same thoroughfare, and the beneficent work among the poor and outcast soon began to be known throughout the Canadian city. For the last five years, the doors of the Yonge Street Mission have been kept open every day.

In all the Dominion, there is not a busier centre of spiritual activity and practical benevolence. Daily, at noon, there is a prayer-meeting, conducted by the Mission workers, at which many business men and others in the neighborhood gather before the throne of grace, and offer up earnest petitions. Every night, without exception, the Gospel of Jesus Christ is preached freely and fully from the Mission platform. At these nightly gatherings there is frequently a spiritual fervor, and a volume of testimonies that never fail to awaken responses in the hearts of those present. It is usually the poorer class who attend the evening gatherings—those who can best appreciate the preciousness of a service held for their special benefit. On Saturday nights, these meetings are frequently under the charge of Young People's Societies from the different city churches, and Christian workers of both sexes, who come there specially to tell the poor and the outcast what the Lord has done for them; to plead with the wayward and the erring to turn to a new and happier life, and to encourage those who have but recently come into the Gospel fold.

Sunday is the "day of days." Morning Bible class, afternoon special meetings for the help and encouragement of beginners in the Christian life, and public outdoor or indoor meetings in the evening (according to the season), engage the full working forces of the Mission. All the services are undenominational, and pastors representing almost every Protestant denomination gladly assist at the meetings. The yearly attendance aggregates 58,000.

In addition to work of an exclusively spiritual character, the Yonge Street Mission has been privileged to homeless men, who would otherwise have been obliged to walk the streets, have been lodged for the night. It will be seen even from this meagre statement, that clothing the naked and the destitute has become an important part of the work of the Yonge Street Mission. "It sometimes happens," writes Superintendent Davis in reviewing the work, "that whole families come to the Mission during the cold winter days, who are without a shred of underclothing, and often with almost bare feet."

During the severe winter months, Sunday Morning Free Breakfasts are given to men at the Mission. These were established and are supported by the Hon. A. S. Blake and Mr. Arthur Burson, two gentlemen who have given liberally of their time and means to the work of the Mission. At each of these breakfasts, two thousand sandwiches and about sixty-five gallons of coffee are served, a hearty song service and a prayer concluding the proceedings.

As to spiritual results, the years since the Mission opened have given steadily increasing evidence that God's blessing rests upon the work, in all its branches. In addition to a large number of genuine conversions, there have been reunions of many families formerly broken up by drink and vice, and hundreds of restorations to home and social position of men whose sins had made them outcasts and wanderers.

Not only in Toronto, but in many other cities, men may be found who date their new and better experience from the time they grasped the Gospel life-line which was thrown out to them by the Yonge Street Mission.

From the beginning, the Mission has been conducted as a work of faith. It is maintained by voluntary contribution. Some of the good people of Toronto, having a deep interest in the work, have given it a loyal support, contributing at regular periods. It has the earnest co-operation and the cordial endorsement of many of the local pastors, who know its value in the field not reached by the churches. It is in every sense a work deserving of the warmest commendation and the widest support. Any reader of this journal who may be interested in learning further concerning it, can do so by addressing Superintendent J. C. Davis, Yonge Street Mission, Toronto, Canada.

THE NOONDAY PRAYER MEETING AT THE YONGE STREET MISSION

do a great deal of benevolent and philanthropic work, which has increased year by year. All special cases which come up at the Mission are inquired into by the house-to-house visitors of the mission, and thus light and joy are brought into many a destitute and dreary home.

During the past twelve-months, 9,264 garments and articles of furniture have been supplied by the Mission to very needy families and individuals; 5,892 free meals have been provided; 200 loaves of bread have been distributed, also quantities of coal. Hundreds of

AN INSPIRING SALUTATION

TEXT — PHILIPPIANS 4: 22:

"All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Cæsar's household"

POPE LEO XIII. was one day giving an audience to some foreigners. Turning to a gentleman present, he asked, "How long have you been in our city?" "Three days," was the answer. "Then," said the Pope, "you have been here long enough to practically know all about Rome." He asked another gentleman, "How long have you been in Rome?" "Three months," was the answer. "Then," said the Pope, "you have been here long enough to know that you have just begun to see Rome." He asked a third gentleman the same question. "I have been here three long years," was the answer. "Then," said the Pope, "you have been here long enough to know that, though a man may live in Rome a hundred years, he can never live long enough to fully appreciate Rome." The longer one lives under the shadow of the Coliseum, the more he realizes how much of history, of conquests and defeats, of culture and ignorance, of purity and vice, of justice and injustice, clusters about the seven hills of the Eternal City.

But, though the most marvelous achievements and the most startling happenings may be panoramaed in that one word, "Rome," yet without doubt, to the Christian student, the most absorbing and intense of all Roman eras is that which includes the history of Nero's reign. Then the persecutions against the early Christians became the most virulent, inhuman and fatal. Then the brutalities and mercilessness of the fiendish monster, Nero, out-Heroded even bloody Herod. Then the lowest dungeons of the inferno were filled with pandemoniums of satanic joy. "For then," wrote the historian, "the Christians were covered by the skins of wild beasts, and torn to pieces by the dogs. Then they were crucified. Then they were smeared with pitch and combustible materials, and burned in the imperial gardens at night. Then at last, from a horror stricken nation, there arose pity for the condemned, since they were not put to death for the public good, but to gratify the cruelty of one man." Yet Paul wrote about this time that, in spite of all these persecutions and martyrdoms, there still remained in Rome men and women who were true to the Christian faith. In the darkest days of the history of the early church, there were Christians ready to testify for Jesus Christ, though they wore the uniforms of the Roman Emperor, and though, on account of that testimony, they knew they had to die.

Exemplary Christian Heroes

Now, as Paul sent the salutations of the saints in Cæsar's palace to the members of the Philippian church for their encouragement, I am going to bring the salutations of the saints who live in Cæsar's modern palaces, for the encouragement of every man, woman and child. I am going to declare to the young and the old, the rich and the poor, the high and the low alike, that though some of you are having a hard time to maintain your Christian integrity against the bombardments of seemingly overwhelming worldly difficulties, yet there are men and women who are maintaining their Christian integrity against troubles infinitely greater than yours. There are men and women true to God to-day who have shouldered upon their backs a whole mountain range of misfortunes and sorrows and pains; while you, comparatively speaking, are going forth into the Gospel fight weighted down only with a little knapsack. There are Christian men who, figuratively speaking, have been flung overboard mid-Atlantic, and told to swim ashore, while you have only a shallow brook to cross. There are Christian men who are ankle deep, knee deep, waist deep, shoulder deep, chin deep in the quicksands of difficulties, who can yet look up and see the face of God; while you, comparatively speaking, have only a stony path to climb. If the saints in Cæsar's ancient and modern palaces could be true to their Gospel faith, surely their spiritual examples ought to rouse every one of us to better and truer and purer and nobler efforts, no matter what our mental or physical or incidental difficulties may be.

I would encourage those Christians, in the first place, who are struggling against the physical depressions of ill-health. Life, even under the brightest of conditions, is an awful struggle. Alexander Pope once compared the ceaseless struggle of life to a continuous journey over the Bridge of Time. Upon one end of this bridge, the English poet started the different generations. Then he kept them moving on and on and on, never allowing the tired and footsore and head aching and heart-aching traveler to halt for one instant. He kept them moving on and on, over the Bridge of Time, until every boy and girl, or young man and young woman, or middle-aged man and middle-aged woman, or sexagenarian or octogenarian or tottering centenarian had tumbled through the broken planks of that bridge, into the dark waters of the River of Death flowing below.

But though the comparison of the struggle of life to a continuous journey is very suggestive, I would rather liken this struggle to a battle-field. I would rather compare it to the struggle of a Thermopylæ, a Marathon, a Waterloo, a Sedan, a Bunker Hill, a Gettysburg, or to a Wilderness in the darkest days of our Civil War. I would rather compare it to a soldier's intense strife, when all his mental and physical resources are brought into play. I would rather apply to it the definition which Henry Ward Beecher gave of life. When some one asked the noted Plymouth pastor if he would like to live his life over again, he replied: "No, sir; though I have won some success in life, I long for the time when I can drop my battle axe. My life has been such a continuous struggle all through, I long for the time when I can leave the scene of human strife, and be like Paul, not unclothed, but 'clothed upon'; not fighting a good fight on earth, but in heaven wearing the crown of a redeemed life."

Strength Out of Weakness

But though life is such an awful struggle for the broad-chested and the stout-limbed and the powerfully-physiued, yet, wonderful to say, some of the mightiest Christian heroes and heroines have been men and women who were physical weaklings. Some of the most famous mental and spiritual giants of the ages have been those whose physical frames were so frail, that they could have been destroyed almost as easily as a dew-drop could be flung from the surface of a leaf, or as a humming-bird's life could be crushed out between the thumb and the forefinger of a man's hand. John Summerfield's body was so frail, that it withered away under the touch of consumption while he was yet a boy. John Summerfield died when he was but twenty-seven. Yet he lived long enough, with that frail body, to bring the Gospel message to the whole English-speaking race of his time. Fanny Crosby, the inspired hymnologist, who has written over 5,000 hymns, by means of which many thousands of souls have nestled "Safe in the Arms of Jesus" (which is, perhaps, her most popular hymn), has such a weak, frail, little body, that there seems to be nothing to her physically. And in addition to her other physical infirmities, God put out the light of her two eyes. And there she sits, in the darkness of her own room, in order that with her eyeless sockets she may better see the face of Jesus Christ. Frances E. Willard in all probability never saw a perfect well day in thirty years; yet with her weak body, she headed one of the mightiest reform movements of her time. With her devoted companions she toured up and down this land, speaking in every town and city of ten thousand inhabitants or over. When she became too feeble to travel, in order to keep her from working, her friends sent her across the seas. Yet even there, under the shadows of the trees, she would write her letters, which roused all the women of Christendom to better deeds for God and humanity.

Famous Sufferers

To show what power this sickly little woman was able to exercise, a male auditor gave his impression of her to a friend in this way: "When she commenced to speak, I felt sorry for her. She seemed to be such a wee little bit of a sickly woman, so very frail and helpless. But when Frances E. Willard had been speaking a short time, this wee little bit of a woman seemed to me to grow nine feet tall, and she seemed to have in her hand a battering ram with which she was pounding upon the door of my heart, until I had to open it and let the Saviour in." To show what was the influence of this frail little woman and the work which she did, I would quote a statement made by Wendell Phillips. He turned to a young man, who was complaining that there were no great reformers to-day, because there were no great reforms to champion, and said, "Young man, did you hear Frances E. Willard speak to-night? If you did, in that frail, little sick body you saw one of the mightiest powers for good this world has ever seen. You also saw her denouncing, perhaps, the mightiest curse of all ages, the curse of intoxicants. Go and do as the sickly Frances E. Willard is doing."

As William Matthews declared that "Julius Cæsar was at last troubled with epilepsy, and Pascal was a confirmed invalid at eighteen, and Channing was a sickly boy and a sickly man, and Johnson, the lexicographer, had a pain-racked frame, and was never free from physical torture, and Lawrence was such a confirmed dyspeptic that he had to weigh the amount of bread he ate day by day," so we find that some of the men and women who have accomplished the most for God have been those whose physical strength indeed was small.

Now, to you who are sitting before me to-day, with the pale face of an invalid, I bring the salutations of the saints who have lived in the Cæsarean palaces of physical infirmity. I would tell you to do something for God, in spite of your bodily pain, as blind John Milton did; as Bella Cooke, who has been bedridden for over forty years, is doing; as Paul did, who was "in bodily presence weak." Your very physical sufferings ought to bring you closer to Christ. Your very sicknesses ought to make you the more anxious to do something for the Saviour, now that your time on earth may be short. They ought to make you as anxious to do something for Christ as was the dying President of Union College, who, when his physician told him he had but one hour on earth to live, said: "Then place me upon my knees, that I may spend that hour in prayer with God, pleading for the salvation of sinful souls!" Would that to-day, in the presence of these saints who have lived in the modern Cæsar's palaces of physical torture, we might all consecrate our frail as well as our well bodies to the service of the Lord Jesus Christ!

I would encourage those Christians also who are trying to maintain their Christian integrity in spite of an evil past. By this statement, I mean those Christians whose past sins have been heralded over the world, even as Cain's sin was known by the black mark which had been stamped upon the murderer's brow. If it is hard for a young girl to be good and pure and true, when she is living in a Christian home, and has practically never been out of her mother's care, how much harder must it be for a young girl to be good and true and pure, when she has had her feet cut and lacerated by treading the crooked and

and has had her fair name blackened by the condemnations of a dissolute life? If it is difficult for a young man to hold an honorable position in society when his record is clean and good, how much more difficult must it be for a man to attain an honorable life when he has served out his time in a felon's cell, or has had his hair cropped by the convict's shears, and his clothes striped with the marks of the penitentiary? If it is difficult for a Christian to live right whose nearest neighbors can find nothing but good to say of him and his past, how much more difficult must it be for a man to live a good life who has been a drunkard, a libertine, a thief, a social outcast? Would you, oh Christian merchant, to-day be willing to have reformed ex-convicts as occupants of your office? Would you, oh mother, allow reformed servants in your home, whose past lives have been dissolute? "No," in all probability you would both answer in an un-Christian way, "I do not bear such people any ill-will; but I would prefer not to have them around my person. They might steal, or perhaps they might lead my children astray, and were such among my help I would dismiss them at once."

Sometime ago, I stood in the store of a personal friend. While there, a gentleman who was a member of the Chicago detective force entered to buy some goods. This officer sharply looked at one of the clerks. Then he came over to the merchant's side and said, "Mr. So and So, that clerk is an ex-convict. He served a term in Joliet penitentiary. You had better keep an eye upon him." Although that ex-convict was a good clerk and had been in the employ of my friend for nearly two years, he was immediately discharged. When I spoke up in his favor, and begged that he be retained and given a chance to live a good life, my friend answered, "No, Mr. Talmage, that man is able to steal every year thousands of dollars without my knowing it! I cannot run the risk." So the poor clerk was driven out of that store, and perhaps driven into a future of crime.

Penitents Become Servants

But though it is so difficult for a man to lead a Christian life, who has had an evil past, yet if there are any such here to-day, I bring to you the salutations of the saints in Cæsar's palace. I want to encourage you with the fact that, just as some of the greatest of moral heroes have been physical weaklings, so some of the greatest of Christian heroes have been those who have sinned even worse than you have sinned. Harry Monroe, who for years has run the Pacific Garden Mission of Chicago, and who has been instrumental in saving thousands of souls, was what?—a college graduate? A member of a Christian church and a Christian home? No. He was a converted gambler. Jerry McAuley of New York, who did so much for the slums of New York, was a drunkard and a prizefighter. John Newton was once vilely dissolute and depraved, though in after life he wrote the noted hymn:

I saw One hanging on a tree
In agony and blood,
Who fixed his languid eyes on me,
As near the Cross I stood.
Sure never till my latest breath
Can I forget that look;
It seemed to charge me with his death,
Though ne'er a word He spoke.

John Newton said that when he first saw Christ hanging there upon the Cross, he himself was wallowing in the lowest depths of sin. John Bunyan the dreamer, was John Bunyan the blasphemer. John Summerfield the saint, about whom we have already spoken, was John Summerfield the depraved. Saul, the chief of sinners, became Paul the martyred saint. Oh, my brother, if the grace of God could come into such sinful lives, and recreate and sustain them, surely the grace of God is sufficient to recreate and sustain us, no matter how black may have been our dissolute past.

Endowed by Experience

And I bring to you who have an evil past, this message from the saints in Cæsar's palace, because the man who has publicly sinned, the man who has been loathsome vile, is the man who has an especial mission to save souls for Jesus Christ. You know, as no one else knows, how awful is the power of temptation. You know, as no one else knows, how difficult it is for one who has been a social outcast to try to live again among respectable social surroundings. You can speak as Mary Magdalene could speak. You can plead as Saint Delia could plead, who was once the noted Blue Bird, the fiend of the New York slums. Although Saint Delia had such an evil past, yet her life, under the power of the Holy Ghost, became so pure and sweet and influential, that the rich and the poor, the pure and the depraved alike, the old as well as the young, sobbed over her casket. You can speak from the heart, as John B. Gough spoke to the drunkards, because you yourself have seen the phantoms of delirium tremens moving themselves aright in the cup, until at last they would bite like a serpent and sting like an adder. Struggling Christians, you who have had an evil past, you can plead for Christ in the highways and the hedges of sin, as the saints who had an evil past could speak in Cæsar's palace. Those saints to-day are now placing their hands of holy ordination upon your head that you may go forth and save your sinful fellow-men.

I would also encourage to-day those Christians who are compelled by force of circumstances to live and work with evil associates. Perhaps the young man who is standing behind the same counter with you in the store is an infidel. Perhaps some of your classmates at school, or in college, are out-and-out scoffers against the Word of God. Perhaps your own father and brothers are unbelievers, and every day your faith in Jesus Christ is made an object of ridicule. Perhaps, what is the worst of all, you find that you are married to a man who never neglects an opportunity to ridicule your Bible. You have found out also that your husband is having a pernicious and spiritually destroying influence over your children. What are you going to do? Leave these evil associates? Sometimes such a course is possible; sometimes it is not. It evidently was not possible for the ancient saints to have left Cæsar's palace, else they would have done so. It is most natural to suppose that those saints would have instantly fled from the Roman capital, during the time of Nero's persecution, if they could have run away with honor and self-respect. But in all probability most of those saints said to themselves something like this: "No, I cannot, I will not go! It would be cowardly for me to desert my Lord and Master. I will stay here and keep on testifying for Christ, if need be, until my body is burned at the stake, or eaten by the wild beasts in one of the arenas. And stay in Rome these saints did, and die a martyr's death most of them also did. So it may be your Christian duty to keep on living for Christ, and testifying of his love in a place of persecution, and among companions who make Christ an object of daily ridicule, as did the persecuted young Roman officer whose epitaph can still be read in one of the Roman cemeteries, in these words: "He lived long enough to shed his blood for Christ."

Now, I want you, my Christian friends, you who are experiencing these daily persecutions, to fully realize that not one drop of blood which fell from the Christian martyrs of Cæsar's ancient palace was ever shed in vain. From those persecutions the great influence of the church of Jesus Christ was started. From those persecutions were lighted the Gospel torches which are to-day shedding their glorious rays all round the world. From those persecutions came not so much Paul's death and the death of the saints in Cæsar's palace, as the eternal life of millions upon millions of immortal souls. So if you, O persecuted Christian, only keep true to the Gospel faith in the difficult places where you are stationed, you may not only win your father and mother and husband and children for God, but you may win thousands upon thousands of immortal souls for Christ—beings whose names you have never read, and whose glowing faces perhaps you shall never see until you look upon them among the redeemed before the great White Throne.

Saints in High Places

So, I repeat, this glorious text brings the salutations of the saints in Cæsar's palace to the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the old and the young alike. It brings its salutations to the rich and the great men. There were many great men and women in Cæsar's household, who were without doubt members of the household of faith. Nero's household, intellectually and financially, was the noted court of its day. And some of the saints in Cæsar's palace must have been numbered among the princes and princesses of the realm, and among the great commanders of the Roman legion, the cabinet officials, and the members of the privy council. So we find to-day, among the great and the famous of the earth, there have been saints in Cæsar's palace. Witness William McKinley, shot down by an assassin's bullet, calmly turning his face toward his invalid wife, saying, "God's will, not ours, be done." Witness Stonewall Jackson, leaving his army hat outside of his tent, as a sign that he did not wish to be interrupted, because he was then on his knees to God in prayer. Witness Neal Dow and Frederick Robertson, and William E. Gladstone, and Thomas Chalmers, and John Knox, and a whole army of earthly saints of whom the world was not worthy. These are some of the famous modern saints who have already won immortal fame, by laying down their lives for Christ.

Heroes in Humble Life

But I also find that in Nero's ancient palace there were slaves as well as rich nobles. There were menials who had to perform the most humble services, as well as generals who commanded Nero's armies, or prime ministers who decided the international policies, or financial ministers who levied the taxes. There were the cooks and the chambermaids. There were the porters and the gardeners and the messengers, the private guards and the negro servants, as well as the white servants. There were the scullions, as well as the ladies-in-waiting, who stood by the empress' side. And the saints in Cæsar's palace were in all probability found in the kitchen as well as in the parlor; in the servant's livery as well as in the courtier's uniform. All of which prove that God is ready to honor the man of one talent, if he is a saint, just as much as he honors the man of ten talents who makes spiritual use of his genius.

My hearers, no matter what our walk of life may be, will you to-day be a saint of God, and throw yourself upon the pardon and the mercy of Christ? Will you here and now dedicate your life to the Saviour, even if that dedication means the shedding of your life's blood? Will you be willing to suffer for Christ, as well as to have the pleasure and the joys that come from the Christian life? Are you ready to shoulder for Christ the heavy burden. Are you ready, for him, to have the feet ache, the hands ache, the back ache, the head ache, and the heart ache?

I would plead with you to be willing to make these sacrifices for Christ, as did the saints in Cæsar's palaces, because it is on account of their sacrifices that Jesus is going to reward you in another place which he has builded for you, not in Rome, but upon the golden boulevard of heaven. It is only a step from the palace of Persecution into the palace of Reward. It is only a step from Cæsar's throne, when the saint of God is condemned to earthly death by the power of sin, to the throne of God, where the redeemed saint is given everlasting life. It is only a step from the Roman arena, where the ancient saints were torn to pieces by the wild beasts, into the green pastures by the side of the still waters, where the glorified saints shall forever dwell with the Lamb. It is only a step—a short step. Are we ready to live for Christ in a place where we may ultimately take that step, although to take it we shall pass through the fires of earthly persecution? It is such a short step for the saints of God from the palaces of Nero to the palaces which Christ has prepared for his own, that it does seem as though the palaces of Persecution are but the vestibules of the palaces of Reward. May God help each one of us to be true to his faith, while we dwell for a little while on earth, in one of Cæsar's earthly palaces!

A CHRISTIAN WORKER'S GOLDEN JUBILEE

A UNIQUE and delightful entertainment took place recently in Old John Street Church, New York, when the congregation of that historic edifice gathered around Mr. John Bentley to wish him joy and do him honor on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of his connection with that venerable institution. Old friends of Mr. Bentley's, who have been associated with him many years in the church, were there; one aged lady, Mrs. Le Comte, a member for seventy years, was present; another, whom he remembered as a grown lady when he was a Sunday School boy, sixty years ago, was represented; nearly every living pastor of the church (Mr. Bentley has been under the administration of twenty-seven different ministers) was there; people from Brooklyn, New Jersey and outlying sections of Manhattan, as well as from the immediate neighborhood, swelled the company paying tribute to one to whom the Psalmist's words, "the beauty of old men is the gray head," most fittingly applies.

Bishop Andrews presided over the meeting. Rev. Dr. Sanford, of Five Points Mission, spoke in behalf of the former pastor, he being of their number: Rev. Mr. Kavanagh, in behalf of the Methodist Hospital (better known to some as the Seney), of which Mr. Bentley is a trustee; Dr. Burt, in behalf of the Church Society and the Deaconess Home; Mr. Frederick Gilbert, in behalf of stewards and class leaders at John street; Mr. Coward, in behalf of the Trustees. A handsome clock was presented to Mr. Bentley as a testimonial of regard and a souvenir of the evening. He was touched with the evidences of affection and esteem received from his pastors and his people; but nothing gave him more pleasure than the announcement, appropriately made on his "Jubilee Night," of a bit of good fortune which had befallen his beloved Church. Mr. Pearsall, of Ridgewood, N. J., a friend of Rev. J. Wesley Johnston, the present pastor, gave the church a handsome new organ. The gift was sadly needed, for the ancient instrument, which has been in use for many years, has surely seen its best days. When the formal meeting was over, there was a happy family

MR. JOHN BENTLEY

Whose fiftieth year of active church work has just been celebrated reunion, refreshments were served, and everybody had a good time. Youths and maidens and little Sunday School children mingled with the gray-headed saints clustering about the servant of God, whose anniversary was being celebrated.

It did not detract from the interest of the occasion that the recipient of such distinguished attention is one of the most unassuming of men, a meek servant of the Master, his crown of honor being his faithfulness to his Lord, and his long and devoted service to his old church. God has prospered him, but he has been too generous to be rich. His church has ever found him a liberal supporter; again and again he has come to her aid in times of financial distress, and but for him, it is said, Old John Street Church, the "Cradle of American Methodism," would have gone out of existence.

The old church, as readers of this paper are aware, is a signpost in our national religious history. It bears to Methodism in New York the relation old Trinity bears to the Protestant Episcopal Church here; and to Methodism at large an important relation, for the first chapel, dedicated in 1769, antedated by eleven years the laying by Wesley of the corner-stone of City Road Chapel, London, so generously cared for to-day by English Methodists. The church is now free from debt, and secure against sale, as it has become the property of the General Conference. It is, however, not endowed, and is supported by voluntary contributions. "It is the only church of any denomination or name east of Broadway and south of Chambers," writes a local historian. The membership is growing. Superintendents and their families living in tops of the tall buildings in the neighborhood make it their spiritual home. Many young people come, and the Sunday School is enlarging. Old members residing in Brooklyn, Jersey, and elsewhere, cling, like Mr. Bentley, to their venerable mother. The same old clock which ticked 135 years ago at the consecration of Francis Asbury, America's first Methodist Bishop, measured off the happy moments of Mr. Bentley's jubilee. It hangs within the altar rail, made by Philip Embury, carpenter and preacher, who was with Barbara Heck, immigrant, founder of the church. The present edifice, dedicated 1741, stands on the site of the first chapel.

THE FEATHERED STEED

A CALIFORNIA OSTRICH PEN

INQUISITIVENESS

LIFE ON AN AMERICAN OSTRICH FARM

THERE has come to us from the land of the Pharaohs, a strange, elongated, long-legged object—the African ostrich. It is now a resident of the Sunny South, forming a sort of gigantic poultry. California, however, leads as the foremost State in adopting the African ostrich; here dwells the pioneer ostrich farmer, Mr. Edward Cawston, who, fifteen years ago, brought over from Africa a ship-load of these curious bipeds, and domiciled them among the khaki-colored mesas of the Golden State. Mr. Cawston no longer controls this incipient industry. A number of New York capitalists, a few years ago, purchased nearly all the American ostriches, some six hundred, the descendants of those brought over by Mr. Cawston, and established the Phoenix, Arizona, ostrich farm. All the young of all the ostrich farms in the South are regularly sold to the Phoenix Ostrich Farm.

At Jacksonville, Fla., Little Rock, Ark., and Los Angeles, Calif., are found ostrich farms, which are patronized by the throngs of visitors who annually seek the seclusion of these famous watering-places. The one at Los Angeles, is the largest and oldest. It lies in a romantic location at the base of the Sierra Madre Mountains, halfway between Los Angeles and Pasadena. This place is owned and managed by Mr. Cawston, who has succeeded in introducing the use of incubators for ostrich culture.

The ostrich is a multiplier, else he would long since have disappeared from the earth. The Arabs and the fierce beasts of the desert have waged war upon those "fleeing phantoms of the wilderness" from time immemorial. There is even a peculiar African crow which drops a stone upon the eggs of the ostrich, fractures and eats them. Yet so prolific is the ostrich that it multiplies in spite of all such discouragements. In 1863 there were less than a hundred domesticated ostriches at the Cape; to-day there are nearly three hundred thousand, furnishing product to the London market exceeding in value eight millions of dollars per annum. One pair of ostriches at the Pasadena farm hatched nearly forty chicks in one year. Every eight months each ostrich is compelled to submit to the painless operation of the shears, being blindfolded, while it is shorn of its beautiful black, white and gray plumes. The ostrich requires very little care and will eat things that are rejected by all other kinds of stock—squeezed grapes, pressed olive skins, large quantities of "culls," or second-class oranges and beets, "mangel-wurzel," and almost anything one can name in the way of farm produce. One man can attend to a hundred ostriches. There are to-day an American ostrich population of about fifteen hundred birds, with every promise of a much greater development in the future.

The Art Portfolio an Inspiration

E. B. Parker, New York City, writes: "The Art Portfolio was received. The inspiration of this conception was truly beautiful. Pictures are, in literature, the same as flowers to the vegetable world, the bloom to a thought. We cannot all be artists, and bask in such beautiful conceptions that make this life a foretaste of the 'eternal beauty of heaven.' Many sad, weary hearts will be elevated by these pictures, in thought and energy, to renewed work and ambition, with sweeter, brighter hope, amid the intricate and oftentimes vexatious duties of this every-day life."

Those Delighted Readers

"Allow me to express my thanks to you for the beautiful Art Portfolio." Mrs. Emma R., Canton, O.

"The pictures are, indeed, a grand surprise. How can you do so much? THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is itself a whole bank of gems and wisdom. The best religious paper in the world. Oh! CHRISTIAN HERALD, live forever!" Mrs. S. L. McA., Newark, N. Y.

A New "Door of Hope"

A BEAUTIFUL new "Door of Hope" has just been established at Tappan, N. Y., making, in eleven years, the fifty-fifth institution adopting this name of promise, and opening its portals to that most hopeless of hopeless beings, the fallen woman—whom the world has ever been ready to stone, but to whom the Master said: "Go and sin no more." "A godly shelter appeals to these poor outcasts of the street as those ignorant of their real condition little imagine," says Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, founder of this chain of Doors of Hope, which stretches from Canada to Texas;

MRS. E. M. WHITTEMORE

from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and across the ocean to Britain, France, Germany, Shanghai and Japan. A pretty little building bearing that magic name now stands in Kangunda, B. E., Africa. It was a rescued girl who offered herself as missionary to that land. "Another saved girl," says Mrs. Whittemore, "three years after leaving the home, was instrumental in opening a mission which I had the pleasure of dedicating not long ago. Many instances could be cited showing God's faithfulness to bless our labors for these erring ones. If the Master's servants saw the life of the lost as we see it, thousands of homes would be opened where we have one now. These servants of Satan raise gilded halls of vice on every side. New York City alone has over ten thousand such public pitfalls; to say nothing of hidden snares Christ's followers need to be up and doing."

In the new Door of Hope at Tappan many industries will be undertaken, such as the raising of flowers, vegetables and poultry, making honey, etc., in addition to indoor pursuits, which include dressmaking, fancy work, and various feminine occupations. Each girl is to receive one-tenth of all profits from sales, thus enabling her to lay up a little sum with which to make a fresh start in life when the institution sends her forth to seek honest labor. Girls have been under disadvantage in this respect heretofore. "Not a few of our redeemed girls," says Mrs. Whittemore, "have started out with no provision. It has been beautiful, though, to watch them trusting the Lord for all things and to note how God has rewarded their faith. The workers will receive their share of the Home's income from the produce; and the remainder will go towards supporting our Door of Hope Mission, 805 Third avenue, where nightly meetings are held in addition to the day's work."

THE PRINCIPAL BUILDING OF THE TAPPAN INSTITUTION

The new Home, with its forty-three surrounding acres, was paid for by the sale of the property on Sixty-first street, known as the "Mother Home," which had to be given up because it was inadequate to the needs of the enlarged work.

In Doors of Hope, spiritual features of the work outrank every other. The study of God's Word is insisted upon; every girl is required to retire alone to the prayer room every day for half an hour's meditation and prayer: some are at first unwilling, but it is beautiful to watch how the gracious habit of communion with God grows upon them, and how their characters develop under it. Workers retire and pray for each other, and to this close walk with God Mrs. Whittemore, founder of the Door of Hope Union, attributes the prospering of this work, which from the beginning has been one of faith—means for support coming as needed—in response to believing prayer.

New York's
New Protestant
Italian Church

Among Picturesque Worshipers

Only Edifice of City

REV. DR. GEORGE F. NELSON

A TYPICAL GROUP IN THE ITALIAN QUARTER

SAN SALVATORE, THE NEW CHURCH

A PRETTY church of gray stone, which has recently arisen on Broome street, near Center, attracts the eye of the public traveling past on trolley cars. By contrast with dingy surroundings, the little church looks doubly clean, cheerful and new. Above its portals, the name "San Salvatore" is graven in large lettering. The visitor on week-days is greeted by a swarthy, dark-eyed janitor, who tries in liquid Italian and struggling English to tell the history of his church, while he proudly points out its beauties and leads the way through the sacred building to the Parish House, at the rear, opening on Elizabeth street. The Guild Hall accommodates on the Sabbath a flourishing Sunday School; on week-days, sewing and cooking schools, and a Girls' Friendly Society; overhead is a gymnasium. The janitor will not let you miss the choir-room. His son, Carlo La Rino, is Choir-Master; and the choir, composed of Italian men and boys, is noted for the sweetness of its singing. A number of San Salvatore's little choir-boys have been guests at Mont-Lawn, and their mellow voices have been heard in the chapel there.

The Sunday visitor to this house of worship finds himself in a congregation wholly Italian; services and singing are in that tongue. Very poor, very earnest, very devout are the worshipers; and very loyal to their American pastor, Rev. Dr. Nelson. Few know enough English to tell the story of their beautiful church, and when questions are asked, they murmur his name.

San Salvatore is the only Italian Protestant Episcopal Church in New York. "The only other Italian church of our communion in this country, so far as I know," says Dr. Nelson, "is in Philadelphia, where Rev. Mr. Zarra has been in charge for the last fifteen years." In this city, several distinctively Italian congregations hold special services in their own tongue in churches and missions of Methodist, Baptist, and other denominations. The larger part of our Italian population belongs to the Roman Church; and, therefore, it behooves Protestants to show particular interest in struggling communities of our own faith.

There are between 250,000 and 300,000 Italians now in the City of New York, and immigrants of this nationality—hailing principally from southern Italy and Sicily, whose conditions of life are hard—are arriving at the rate of 100,000 annually. Most of them are extremely poor. "They are," says Dr. Nelson, "as a rule, thrifty; they live cheaply, and as the children grow up in our public schools, the parental condition improves." A noticeable feature about San Salvatore's services, is the proportion of men in attendance, this sex composing two-thirds of the average congregation. Dr. Nelson takes great pride in his Men's Club, numbering 105 members, who are usually at worship on Sunday. This club takes care of its sick, and buries its dead; out of hard earnings, the members (laborers who get small wages), keep the modest treasury up to necessary requirements.

San Salvatore began years ago, as a small congregation worshipping in St. Andrew's Church, Rev. Mr. Strauder being in charge; from St. Andrews it was transferred to Grace P. E. Chapel on Fourteenth street, where Dr. Nelson was minister. When, fifteen years ago, St. Philip's Church, on Mulberry near Bleeker, was vacated by a negro congregation, which moved up town, Miss Catherine Lorillard Wolf, purchased the property and presented it to the Italian mission; and the Italians went into their own church and called it San Salvatore. Six years ago, the city required the church site for the extension of Elm street, and a temporary place of worship was fitted up in a store on Bleeker street for this traveling congregation. In 1900, Rev. Alberto Paci, who had succeeded Mr. Strauder, died, and since then, Dr. Nelson, Bishop Potter's secretary, has been rector. The doctor speaks Italian, and is intensely interested in his charge. He seeks to secure employment for them, and helps them in various ways. The Italian in New York, be he ever so industrious, is, of course, at a disadvantage, because of his ignorance of our language. He needs friends.

With the money received for the Mulberry street lot, the present property, 359-361 Broome, with the Elizabeth street extension, was purchased; the buildings were erected with other funds at the disposal of the Italian committee, the total outlay being $115,000. Organ, altar, pulpit and lectern are gifts from ladies of Grace Church; one lady had the gymnasium built at her expense; Rev. Dr. Huntington, rector of Grace, and his vestry, presented the choir-stalls. Opening services were held on June 1, a day of special significance to loyal Italians, as the anniversary of the unification of Italy. The pretty church stands in a populous Italian neighborhood, and a future of large opportunity and many good works is before it.

IN CHILDHOOD'S "GARDEN OF EDEN"

JOYOUS PLAYTIMES
AT MONT-LAWN

THAT'S a big game in which over two hundred children join at one time! After the Fourth of July, on which day our little folks appear altogether in patriotic plays and exercises, it is customary for the company, broken up in sections, to seek fun in separate ways under their several teachers and caretakers. Down to the Hudson goes one detachment, armed with various small garments that serve as impromptu bathing-suits. As they march away, the big stage rolls out of the yard, loaded with a crowd bound for a drive around Rockland Lake, and the two factions vie with each other in demonstrations of joy and glorification. Under the trees near the cottages groups cluster around teachers, who are reading or telling stories. Over the hill or down to the meadow, teachers stroll, followed by little folks on eager hunt for wild-flowers or seeking happy times in the woods. From the tent over the bathing-pool come sounds of great splashing and shrieks of delight. One morning the coveted pleasure of disporting themselves here belongs to boys, another morning to girls. In the meadow, boys are racing and chasing each other about. On the green, a great ring-dance of little lads and lassies unrolls like a wreath, and the chorus leaps forth, "All around the mulberry bush, so early in the morning." Every scup holds an occupant, and up into the green trees, pink, blue and red gowns are flying like birds of gay plumage. In some sequestered path, a little one is making sand-piles and having a quiet time all by himself, bigger boys being so engaged elsewhere that they have no leisure for bestowing critical attention upon him. The statement that the whole company is rarely together in "one big game," save on the Fourth, must, in truth, be qualified, the writer feels, on reconsideration, and in justice to the loyal little children, who, when their beloved friend, Dr. Klopsch, visits them, always come trooping from hill and dale, with shouts of joyous greeting; thereafter circling close about him in all their merry sports.

Our picture shows a favorite play, the "Bean Game." Beans are scattered over the lawn, and the children have a fine time seeing who can find the most beans first.

To make the children happy is the end and aim of Mont-Lawn. Here, are toilers from the city, whose small backs bear hard burdens; starvelings of the street, whose only playground has been the pavements; sad-faced, solemn, care-ridden children—is it not a sweet and sacred duty and privilege to lead them in merry play where the green grass is under their feet, the blue sky overhead, the leafy trees around them, the songs of birds in their ears; where flowers grow for their plucking, and where everything reminds them that in this fair earth God has made, they have some free part.

Every friend of children of the poor, no matter how distant, who sends a gift and utters a prayer for Mont-Lawn, shares with workers here in the blessed service of caring for our host of needy little ones. Harvest of childish smiles and laughter is for their reaping; restored health to many feeble waifs is fruit of their loving-kindness. And, who knows, when in heaven the roll is called, but that a multitude may answer: "We were shown the way here at the Children's Home." Nearly 14,000 little ones have been our guests. Many of these learned first at Mont-Lawn of Christ's love; learned there their first prayer, their first song of praise.

Will you help us lead little feet into paths of peace, and joy, and safety? Only $3 sends a child for ten days to Mont-Lawn; $6 sends two; $9 three; $12 four; $36 twelve, and so on; $21 supports a cot for the season, giving seven waifs an outing. A cot may bear the donor's name, or that of any beloved one in whose memory given. Money should be sent to this paper, garments to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

Home Defences

SADDENING beyond expression are the reports which appear with increasing frequency in the daily press, of fatalities resulting from vice among young people. At the present time, an investigation is being made as to the death of a young man and a young woman, who, as the authorities suspect, were murdered by a companion after a night of dissipation. Only recently, a young man was found murdered, and there was reason to suspect a girl of his acquaintance of firing the shot which killed him. This week, too, revelations have been made of a systematized plot, which has been horribly successful, for inveigling young girls into evil places in a suburb of New York. Crimes of this kind are evidently increasing in number, and it is grievous to think how precious are the victims. Fathers and mothers proud of their daughters, delighted in watching their development from girlhood into womanhood, gratified by witnessing their growing beauty, are suddenly stricken down with heart-break, by the revelation of the ruin of their treasured darlings. It is distressing to think of the suffering of parents thus despoiled, appalling to think of the fate of the victims.

Can nothing be done to check this horrible tide of immorality which is rushing over the land, stripping the homes of their brightest jewels? If some wild beast were prowling around our towns devouring the loveliest and tenderest among us, how we would organize to slay it! If some band of brigands were invading our cities, and carrying away our sisters and daughters, how every man and boy would enroll as a guard! Yet these sacrifices are going on, and no measures are being taken to prevent them!

The misfortune is that there is a traitor in the garison. The victims themselves, too often, go heedlessly to the slaughter. It is there that our measures of defence must be taken. The work must be done by the mothers and fathers of the girls. We have gloried in the liberty allowed to our children, but we are paying an awful penalty for the risks we have boasted of running. The time has come for a reconsideration of our system of family discipline. There should be not only a limit to the liberty accorded, but there should be an earnest and well-directed effort to strengthen the barriers in the souls of the children, against the assaults of temptation. The love of virtue should be inculcated, the hatred of contaminating speech and degrading association should be implanted, and greater care should be exercised to prevent the entrance of unprincipled men into the circle of family friendship. There ought also to be a strict supervision of the literature that comes into the home, and a rigid exclusion of every book and journal which portrays vice in an attractive form.

Parents, what is your daughter worth? Is she not worth all the trouble and effort you can take to save her from evil?

A Unique Charity

IN these days of splendid benevolences, of the founding of great libraries, finely-equipped hospitals, and richly endowed institutions for secular and religious education, it is rare to find a rich person bequeathing the bulk of his property for purely eleemosynary purposes. A notable illustration of this simple form of charity has lately been announced in New York, where John M. Burke, a retired merchant, has handed over to trustees control of the princely sum of four millions of dollars, to be applied during his lifetime for the establishment of a Convalescents' Home, and also for a Trust Fund for the relief of the worthy indigent, who are temporarily unable to help themselves. Mr. Burke, is an octogenarian; but he is still mentally and physically active, and hopes, like Peter Cooper and Andrew Carnegie, to live to see his great charity firmly established in his own lifetime.

In a city like New York, with its vast cosmopolitan population, and its army of deserving poor, a charity of the character that is projected, if wisely conducted, cannot fail to be productive of incalculable good. So far as we know, there is none like it now in existence. It is the founder's intention that his generous gift shall be so administered as "not to increase, but to prevent the growth of poverty." Relief will be extended to self-respecting persons and worthy, industrious families, who have been able as a rule, to maintain themselves. Moreover, the relief is to be temporary, as it is not designed "to establish an asylum nor to provide for a body of pensioners." Charity which pauperizes, by taking away the incentive to honest effort at self-support, is a dangerous experiment in any community. "He that will not work," will not enjoy the benefits of Mr. Burke's generosity. The relief afforded will not be extended to the vicious, the dissipated, the professional mendicant or the chronic loafer. "Red tape," that bane of our present charity systems, will be eliminated as far as possible, and the shortest methods will be adopted in order to ascertain the worthiness of the applicant, and to extend the relief expeditiously.

Among the multitude of great benevolences that have marked recent years, there is none that would seem to approach more nearly to the ideal charity than this princely gift, by a man hitherto unknown. In devoting his fortune to the systematic and discriminating relief of the intelligent and deserving poor, the donor has chosen as the objects of his beneficence, the very class whose members would be the last to make their needs known, and who shrink, from motives of self-respect, from appealing through the ordinary channels for public aid. Having grown up through poverty and struggle to honorable affluence, Mr. Burke has personal knowledge, both by observation and experience, of the needs and the tribulations of honest poverty. When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, several years ago, during a winter of great suffering and destitution in New York, was conducting a widespread work of charity, in which nearly a score of city pastors co-operated, it was found that the most deserving cases were those of the "secret sufferers," who, rather than publish their wants to the world, or be known as recipients of charity, preferred to face almost certain death by starvation. These did not belong to the lazy or worthless class, but were idle and helpless through no fault of their own. Their fortitude was heroic, and it was a matter for sincere congratulation that so many of this class were discovered and succored ere it was too late.

If Mr. Burke's royal gift, in the hands of wise trustees, reaches down into the social depths a helping hand to the really deserving, and becomes a means of rehabilitation, and an anchor of hope to the temporarily unfortunate—of whom there are many thousands always to be found in New York—it will be doing a greatly needed and a Christ-like work. Would there were many others who might make it the study of their lives, as he has evidently done, to employ their wealth, not in vain or lavish show, or for personal glorification, but where it will do the greatest good, by bringing health and happiness into the homes and hearts of "God's poor," wherever they are to be found.

Do Something

IF I wish to be an artist, what course should I take? Clearly, it is not enough to think about art, to study it even. I must do something. When Michael Angelo was called upon to paint his famous frescoes, he knew nothing of that particular realm of art; but he went out instantly into the Vatican garden, and began to turn up the mould to find the right earths to grind into colors. His very first instinct was not to theorize, but to act.

So evermore the voice of the world cries to us, Do something! Do the least act of kindness, and by so much you are nearer to realizing that God is love. Speak but one simple word of fearless truth, and by so much you are nearer to the conception that God is Light, the very light of infinite and unchanging Truth. To do right is to know right, and in increasing measure. To will the will of God in caring for the poor and needy and in all faithful living, this is to know God.

Try to be God-like. Submit yourself to do his will. Make your conduct as noble as you can; it will be the daily brightening mirror which will catch the rays of the unseen God. Live up to the highest and the best you know, whether it be little or much, and your obedience to right will be the organ by which spiritual vision will become clear to you.

The Denver International Convention Elects New Officers

THE proceedings of the tenth International Sunday School Convention, at Denver, Colo., indicate how thoroughly in earnest are the men and women engaged in the Sunday School work, and how sincerely they are striving to increase its efficiency.

The new chairman of the Association is Rev. B. B. Tyler, minister of the South Broadway Christian Church of Denver. The chairman of the Executive Committee is W. N. Hartshorn, of Boston, Mass. Among the members of the new Executive Committee from the Eastern States and Provinces are:

British Columbia, N. Shakespeare; Connecticut, H. H. Spooner; Delaware, W. O. Hoffecker; District of Columbia, W. W. Millan; Florida, H. C. Groves; Georgia, W. S. Witman; Indiana, W. C. Hall; Manitoba, F. W. Olligan; Maine, L. R. Cook; Maryland, J. P. Campbell; Massachusetts, W. N. Hartshorn; Michigan, E. K. Warren; Newfoundland, Dr. N. D. Fraser; New Brunswick, E. R. Machum; Nova Scotia, F. D. Woodbury; New Hampshire, P. Bingham; New Jersey, the Rev. F. Smith; New York, W. A. Duncan; North Carolina, N. Broughton; Ohio, E. L. Young; Ontario, J. J. MacLaren; Pennsylvania, H. J. Heinz; Prince Edward Island, D. B. McLeod; Quebec, S. P. Leet; Rhode Island, T. Waterman; South Carolina, W. E. Pelham; Vermont, D. M. Camp; Virginia, J. R. The following will be the Lesson Committee for the next three years: F. I. Patrick, Manitoba; Ira M. Price, Chicago; A. C. Dixon, Boston; the Rev. C. R. Hemphill, Louisville; the Rev. John Potts, Toronto; the Rev. A. E. Dunning, Boston; the Rev. B. B. Tyler, Denver; Professor J. R. Sampey, Louisville; Bishop H. W. Warren, Denver; the Rev. J. S. Stahr, Lancaster, Pa.; the Rev. A. F. Schaffner, New York; the Rev. E. B. Kephart, Baltimore; John R. Pepper, Memphis; the Rev. Moses R. Hodes, St. Louis; C. I. Rexford, Montreal.

Dr. Potts, who will probably be chairman of that Committee, made the definite announcement that the Temperance lessons, which break the continuity of the series and are consequently opposed by a large number of teachers, would be continued for the present. A system of grading in the schools was advocated and approved by the Association. It was recommended that three grades be established and that the pupil be six years in one grade before being promoted.

The next International Convention will be held in Toronto, and it was stated that in 1904 a World's Convention would be held in Jerusalem.

Realized More than was Sent

From Rev. W. H. Stephens, Secretary and Treasurer of our Famine Orphan Support Committee in India, we have received this letter:

BOMBAY, May 31st, 1902.

Received of Dr. Louis Klopsch, draft No. 8704, on the Astor Place Bank, for twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000), which is the sixth payment of like amount, and pays up to the end of the second year for the support of the 5,000 famine orphans, for which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stands pledged. Rupees 76,562.8 were realized from the above.

W. H. STEPHENS.

It will be seen from the foregoing, that the Orphan Support work realized $520 more than the amount transmitted from New York, that being the profit on exchange.

Bowery Mission Circles

Every week adds to the number of Lighthouse League Circles, which are now being organized throughout the country, in connection with the spiritual and rescue work of the Bowery Mission, New York. These Circles are for practical Christian work, and are open to all who desire to serve the Master in a simple and unostentatious way. If you have not yet done so, write for full particulars and enrolment cards to O. B. Booth, General Secretary, 92 Bible House, New York.

A Church Prayer Answered

Mrs. L. M. Duryee, Boonsboro, Ia., writes:

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:—I wish to give thanks to God, through you, for answered prayer. After moving here last fall, and seeing the great need of our little Gospel Tabernacle Church here, I asked the Lord to show me some way to help, and the answer seemed to come, "Write to the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD." I sent the appeal, which you so kindly gave to the readers of our dear paper, and the Communion outfit, so much needed, has just arrived, donated by a far-away Eastern church.

Two Pleased Oregon Readers

W. P. and P. W., Hood River, Wasco Co., Oregon, writes: Your arrival was in time, together with the book, Heaven, Home and Happiness, also your Art Gallery,—all in good order—we were delighted with all. In these days of failure by the average publication to perform or comply with its promises, it is refreshing to know that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does better and gives more than it promises, and as such occupies a mighty lonesome position in journalism. You can depend upon wife and I as members during our earthly pilgrimage.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The New Brooklyn Bridge

NONE but they who have been in the crush at the New York end of the Brooklyn Bridge in the rush hour, can appreciate the joy that filled many a heart when the news was published, a few days ago, that the last wire had been stretched across the new bridge. The present bridge over the East River will necessarily remain the main avenue of traffic between the two cities, but when the new bridge is finished, thousands who now cross the present bridge every day, will use the new one, and the fearful crush will be relieved. The new bridge is about a mile north of the present one. Its New York terminus is at the foot of Delancey street and the Brooklyn terminus at South Sixth street. The main span is 1,600 feet and the approaches on each side bring the entire length up to 7,200 feet. The width is 118 feet, furnishing accommodation for two elevated railroad tracks, four surface car-tracks, two roadways for wagons, two cycle paths, besides the footways for pedestrians. The amount placed to the credit of the Commissioners who control the construction is $10,215,239, of which over seven millions has already been spent. The work was begun in the summer of 1896 and it is expected that the bridge will be finished early in 1904. The pictures on this page give a vivid idea of the present condition of the enterprise. As all the wires have now been strung, the next duty is to put bands around them, forming them into four huge cables, from which the trusses to support the flooring will be suspended. When completed, it will be one of the best, if not the very best bridge, in the world, as all the newest improvements in late date. All the charts indicate deep water at that point. Recognizing the importance of the harbor of New York, the Government's hydrographers have been particularly careful, yet this rock was not found until the vessel struck it. It appears that similar instances have occurred elsewhere. A vessel was badly injured at the entrance to the Red Sea a short time ago by a rock not marked on the charts, and another rock was discovered by a wreck on the southwest coast of England, though that coast had been surveyed only a few weeks previously. We may be sure the omission in the charts would be speedily corrected. The rocks so discovered would never be overlooked again, and all mariners would be careful to avoid them. Unhappily, it is not so with moral dangers. We see every day men going into temptations which, as they well know, have proved disastrous to others.

Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted (I. Cor. 10: 6).

To Reform Pigs

An interesting experiment is being made by the Department of Agriculture. An eminent authority, in connection with the Department, has a theory that naturally the pig is as clean an animal as the hound, and that its uncleanly habits are due to association and inherited characteristics. To test the truth of this theory, a number of sucklings of the Poland China breed are to be subjected to a practical test. They will be put in a clean, well-drained sty, carpeted with moist sand, and isolated from contaminating associations. They are to be fed on clean food, and an effort will be could understand. A lady who came to inquire after her, however, recognized it immediately as Hindustani. She was quite as much puzzled as the doctors at hearing her friend speaking so volubly, for she was aware that before her illness she could not speak the language. She knew about a dozen Hindustani words, but could not frame them into a sentence; yet in her illness she recited long poems in Hindustani, and put questions and apparently answered imaginary questions in that language. When the patient recovered she was as incapable as before her illness of speaking the language. It appears that she was born in India, and until she was five years old was in charge of a nurse who could not speak English. She was sent at the age of five to England to be educated, and she married there and did not return to India. She completely forgot the language of her childhood, and had casually mentioned that she had done so to the lady who called upon her during her illness. The incident strikingly confirms the theory recently propounded by psychologists, that there is a sub-conscious mind which retains all impressions, and reproduces them when the active mind loses control. What an ominous fact this is for those who do not seek the cleansing which comes through Christ. They may find forgotten sins eventually coming to mind to condemn them in the judgment.

For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; neither hid, that shall not be known (Luke 12: 2).

BRIEF NOTES

Evangelist Davidson has closed a most successful series of services at Brattleboro, Vt. Rev. H. R. Miles, pastor of the church, speaks in glowing terms of the results of the work.

Looking east from the Brooklyn side

Looking across to New York

TWO VIEWS OF THE NEW BRIDGE ACROSS THE EAST RIVER, FROM NEW YORK TO BROOKLYN

the art of bridge-building have been applied, and the contractors have had the benefit of the experience gained in building the bridge now in use. In spite of all sinister predictions, the present bridge has answered its purpose well, and has supported a greater strain than was expected to be put upon it when it was built. Among the thousands who will use the new bridge when it is finished, how few there will be who will give a thought to the need which will come to every one at death, of a way of access, not from city to city, but from earth to heaven! That no man could have ever constructed, but in the goodness of God it has been provided, and all who will may avail themselves of it.

Having therefore boldness to enter into the holy place by the way which he dedicated for us, a new and living way through the veil, that is to say his flesh (Heb. 10: 20).

Perils Under Water

One of the last appropriations of the River and Harbor Committee of Congress was of $25,000, to remove an obstruction to navigation from the bed of the North River of New York. The obstruction is a projecting rock, which rises twenty-five feet out of the bed of the river. It was discovered recently by the steamer Kennington, which, passing over the jutting rock at low tide, was injured by it and had to put in for repairs. Happily she was only grazed by the rock. If she had struck it directly it would have stove a hole in her that would have sent her to the bottom. The singular fact about it is that the rock was not discovered until this made to inculcate cleanly habits. The experiment is to continue for a year, at the end of which time they will be put in an enclosure, half of which will be clean, like their former quarters, and the other half foul and noisome, such as pigs are supposed to like. There will be a trough in each, containing respectively food in harmony with the environment—garbage in the dirty enclosure, and clean food in the clean. The animals will be watched to see which half they will voluntarily occupy. It will be interesting to watch which they will choose. We know that in human nature there would be little doubt. Unless the heart is regenerated a year's compulsory residence in good surroundings would not eradicate the desire for evil. We are assured that even if the bad man were admitted into heaven he would not find the society congenial.

Let favor be shown to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness; in the land of uprightness will he deal wrongfully (Isa. 26: 10).

Unconscious Memory

A leading medical journal reports a singular instance of a revival of childhood memories. A lady, seventy years of age, was under treatment for broncho-pneumonia. It was a critical case, owing to the advanced age of the patient, and it became almost desperate when delirium set in, and continued for three days. The patient eventually recovered, but the feature of her illness, which is of interest to medical science, was the peculiarity of her talk during her delirium. It was in a foreign language, that neither the doctors nor the nurses

The Uganda Mission, Central Africa, has now 34,239 Christians, an advance of 6,000 in the last year.

Mr. B. F. Jacobs, the eminent Sunday School worker, is dead. He leaves a vacant place that it will not be easy to fill.

Gratifying reports have been received of the rains in India. Gujarat has had copious showers, and other districts which suffered in the recent famines are hopeful of good harvests this year.

The Prison Fund, started by Mr. D. L. Moody, has been instrumental in distributing, free, among the prisoners of the United States and Canada 370,611 copies of Bibles, Testaments and religious books.

Dr. Gunsaulus made an impressive address to the graduates of the Armour Institute at the recent commencement. His last words, as he leaned over the pulpit, were, "God be with you," and then he added, "Be with God."

At Mt. Holyoke Commencement, President Woolley conferred degrees upon 107 candidates. The $40,000 gift of Miss Helen Gould as an endowment of the chair of Biblical Literature, in memory of her mother, was announced, and she herself was an honored guest.

Northfield Seminary this year has graduated the last class that knew D. L. Moody personally. Miss Helen Gould was present at the exercises. The Commencement sermon was by Dr. C. I. Scofield, and the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan delivered the address.

At a Salvation Army meeting in the chief prison of Jamaica, W. I., there were 463 male and female prisoners present. After Commissioner Cadman's address, more than two hundred asked him to visit them in their cells and pledged themselves to an amended life.

Dr. Roger S. Tracy, the eminent physiologist, says that a child starting life with a good constitution ought to live to be a hundred years of age, if he will be a light eater and drinker, abstain from all intoxicants, avoid anger and violent emotion, and lead a quiet, useful life.

The largest Eastern conference of college women ever held under the auspices of the American committee of Young Women's Christian Associations, met recently at Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y. There were 550 delegates, representing all the leading women's colleges of the Northeast and Canada, in attendance.

In the Golden Summer

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

VACATION HINTS

A YOUNG woman discovered the other day that she could not be spared from her desk for a prolonged vacation this summer, because there was no one to take her place. If the work fell into arrears it would occasion much inconvenience, and also give her a good deal of hard work in catching up with it. She considered awhile, and then she decided to take her vacation by days' outings now and then, or by absences from Friday until Monday.

One who resides in a large city like New York or Chicago, has choice of a great many pleasant and inexpensive excursions, if she decides upon brief intervals of leisure, instead of a longer space. Our country is everywhere intersected by electric cars. They carry people over beautiful routes, by seashore and mountain, for a few cents. Taking a picnic luncheon of dainty sandwiches, cake and fruit, with a bottle of lemonade or of cold tea, one may fare delicately when off for the day. Ice may be procured if one is near an inn; or if one does not wish to take a home luncheon, and can afford to go to a hotel, one may have an excellent hot meal, well-served, at many a country hostelry, at a small cost.

Two Yale students, a year or more ago, decided on taking a wheeling tour through England and Scotland. They carried their bicycles on a slow-going steamer from New York, and limited their luggage to the lowest amount consistent with cleanliness and comfort. The total cost of their eight weeks abroad, inclusive of the voyage over and back, was $140 each. And they had a most beautiful time.

Young women, if they group their party well, and combine their purses, may take a European trip, or a jaunt across the continent, at a very modest figure. Every such party of girls should be chaperoned by an older woman of good sense and experience.

Never weight yourself with too many clothes when you go on a holiday which requires much change of place. Trunks are a mistake, if bags will answer. Great is the convenience of a straw telescope and a shawl-strap.

As a rule, one should not choose a public holiday for an outing or excursion, if one can help it. The crowds are too large for comfort on such days. Do not, if you are a mother, attempt to take four small children at a time for a day at the seashore; they and you will come home fagged out, cross, and half ill. If you can take one child by herself, and leave the others in good hands till their turn comes, then go and be happy.

Business Women and Luncheon

An army of young women go to business every day. The question of their luncheon is very important, as on it depends their health and strength. Many employers provide a pleasant place in which their women clerks may lunch, and in some cases lunch counters, and even restaurants, are kept up in order that at a moderate price women may secure a good and wholesome meal. Where food is not provided, there is often an opportunity to make tea, coffee and cocoa, so that the luncheon brought from home may be supplemented by the hot drink. In large cities, where dairies and restaurants are numerous, a very good meal may be bought for a sum varying from ten to twenty-five cents, the latter including a dinner of several courses. A young girl who works at a typewriter may, in some places, obtain a good meal for eight cents; the luncheon should be somewhat substantial. Pie and cake are not so serviceable as soup, cold meat, eggs, bread and butter, and a choice from the several cereals, which afford real nutriment to the hungry.

The temptation of the business woman is to do without her luncheon. Noon comes, she is tired and faint, but appetite is lacking. A brisk walk before eating and a five minutes' rest will often enable her to feel hungry. She is hungry, and if she does not eat, she will probably break down before many months. Irregular eating is the subtle cause of dyspepsia. Among the many admirable things wrought by the Young Women's Christian Association, none commends itself to the thoughtful more highly than the provident manner in which it opens both rest-rooms and lunch-rooms for hard-working business girls.

Another Menace to Morals

"Put that book in the fire. Tear out the leaves, stuff them into the grate, set a match to them, destroy the whole thing as soon as possible."

UNCLE JIM AND AUNT LOTTIE DAVIS

He is 114 and she is 103 years old. Both are still living in their Southern log cabin. They are said to be the oldest negro couple in the South. It is characteristic of negroes to look younger than they are. These centenarians compare favorably with white folks of seventy-nine or eighty.

The maid looked bewildered, and no wonder, for the book was very handsomely bound, and looked like an ornament for the centre table.

"Would it not do to banish it to the top shelf?" suggested a visitor.

"I would as lief," said the lady of the house, "lay away a scarlet fever germ, or an infant cobra, as to put that wretched book anywhere in my home, or in the world, where an innocent, pure-minded boy or girl, or a clean, wholesome, good-mannered grown man or woman might get hold of it. The book drifted in here; it was sent by mail as a gift to me, why I cannot imagine. It is vulgar, profane, indelicate, poisonous. I will not suffer it to exist as a menace to the morals of my children."

The attitude of this lady is the one that ought to be taken by every housemother. Bad books do insert themselves in pure homes. You do not always know it. If you are busy, hard-working and hard-pressed for time, you may overlook the fact that your young son is absorbed in a book which he has borrowed. You may, too late, note signs of moral degeneracy, for which you cannot account. Had you read the evil book, you would be at no loss.

There is a protection of innocence, and there is a protection of knowledge. One or the other you should give to every growing boy and girl under your care. Either, please God, may be invincible. The bad book is a baleful and poison-tipped arrow flung straight at the heart of your child. Keep it out of the home. If it gets in, burn it, and scatter its ashes on the winds.

The Woman Doctor

WITHIN the memory of many persons now living, and by no means old, the woman doctor was regarded with suspicion, if not with disfavor. Medical colleges were slow to share with women the opportunities freely accorded to men. At present there are a number of excellent medical schools for women, and their presence is not infrequent nor unwelcome at clinics formerly held for men only. Furthermore, women have proved themselves very able physicians, and they practice successfully side by side with men. Every large woman's college has, of course, its resident lady doctor, and parents feel at ease when they send their daughters from home, knowing that the doctor will prevent their overworking and will care for their health. Insane asylums have women in attendance as physicians for women patients. Children's hospitals require them, and they have an especially beneficent practice among the poor. On the foreign mission field the woman doctor is indispensable. She is welcome in those secluded women's quarters, from which men are barred by the customs of the ages, and her presence is potent to relieve suffering and save life, so that princes and peasants alike bless her. She is a most successful missionary, following so closely in the footprints of the Master, who went about doing good and healing the sick. On foreign soil, women perform frequently the most delicate and difficult surgical operations, proving that they have the nerve, the courage, and the skill, the deft hand and the quick eye and cool judgment essential to the surgeon. People who in these days—there are some—do not believe in women doctors, are really very much behind the times, and are not in step with the procession.

Prayer in Child-Training

A mother tells us, and asks us to pass on her belief, that prayer is invaluable in child-training. Surely this is so. Before the child is born it should be prayed for. Every year of its life should be encompassed with prayer. Often the mother should take her child aside, and kneeling down, ask God's blessing in the child's presence, and when a child is weak, wayward, or wandering, the mother's recourse should be to her Heavenly Friend. He giveth wisdom liberally to all who ask it, and the parent who humbly seeks guidance from above will not fail to receive it in the hour of need. You mothers who have dear little children around you, begin now while their hearts are soft and receptive, the sweet task of leading them to Jesus. Pray with and for them daily.

LOST DAYS

Lost days are days when none are comforted
By us, who have no time to spare for love.
Lost days are those when we give stones for bread,
Nor lift our eyes in prayer to One above.
God pity us; our lost days' weight is dead,
A millstone pulling down the fainting head. LUCIA.

May a Woman do the Courting?

A reader asks the question, supposing, for instance, the case of a diffident man who admires a woman, but lacks courage to court her. From time immemorial, woman's prerogative has been to be sought, her privilege to be wooed, and it would be a strange reversal of situations were she to become the wooer. Yet, in fact, every woman, consciously or unconsciously, encourages a bashful suitor, and no true woman inflicts the pain of refusal upon any man, because she has it in her power to show him by unmistakable signs whether or not he interests her. The sort of woman who deliberately sets herself to engage the affections of a man, is of an order, let us hope, very seldom encountered.

GOD, OUR SUPREME GOOD

WORSHIPING THE GOLDEN CALF

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JULY 27
EXODUS 32: 1-6, 30-35

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- EXODUS 20: 3:
"THOU SHALT HAVE NO OTHER GODS BEFORE ME"

The Lesson Story

MOSSES stood for God among the Israelites. So long as they could see Moses, God seemed near and real to them. But their faith in God was not strong enough to thrive with Moses out of their sight for forty days. They demanded something which they could see to represent God. Aaron was not brave enough to tell them that they could have no sign or symbol, nor was he wise enough—priest, though he was—to teach the people to fasten their love on God whom they could not see. Aaron was so weak and foolish, that he said: "Yes, I will give you what you want." And the people wanted what they had seen in Egypt—a golden calf—and they were quite ready to give Aaron their golden earrings, out of which to make the calf, men as well as women. In making the calf, Aaron did not think he was giving them an idol to worship in place of God, for the calf was dedicated by a proclamation of "a feast unto the Lord," and burnt-offerings and peace-offerings were offered to God. The calf was intended to be a symbol of the Giver of life. Aaron was not in sympathy with the idea of having the golden calf—though he had made it, or ordered it to be made—for he ridiculed the people, saying: "Behold the God that brought you out of Egypt!" But the sight of the calf not only did not bring the people nearer to God, but it kept their thoughts away from him, and carried them back to the days of idolatry in Egypt. The Israelites did as the Egyptians had done in Egypt—they worshipped the golden calf in dance and song and feast. Their revelry was seen by God, whom they were thus dishonoring, and upon the mountain he told Moses of his displeasure. Moses besought God that he would forgive the people. God told Moses to go down and see for himself what the people were doing. God could see it all, but Moses, being a man, could not. Moses went down from the mountain carrying with him the two stone tables of the commandments. When he got far enough down the mountain to see the people dancing around the calf, he was so angry that he threw the Commandments down on the ground, and they were broken in pieces. When he got back into the camp, he melted the calf into a shapeless mass in fire, and had it ground or filed into powder, and mixed it with water, and made the people drink it. And so they drank up their god! That was a good way to teach the people how foolish they had been. In God's name, Moses sentenced to death by the sword, three thousand of the people who had demanded that the golden calf should be made.

Then Moses prayed to God again that he would forgive the Israelites. Wonderful was the prayer of Moses, showing how he loved his people, for he told God he was willing to be punished with them if God could not forgive them. And where was Moses when he made this prayer? He was in his own tent, but he had moved his tent far away from all the other tents, for he knew that God would not yet come among the people whom he had not yet forgiven. Moses showed the people how they had separated themselves from God.

God came in a pillar of cloud and fire to the tent of Moses, to "talk with him as a man talketh with his friends." How wonderful that must have seemed to the people! God told Moses to prepare two new stones, and bring them to the top of the mountain, and he would again write the Ten Commandments. And so Moses did; and when he came down from the mountain with the newly-written Law, his face shone so brightly that he had to put on a veil before the people could look upon him. He had been on the mountain with God forty days and forty nights, and God's shining brightness was upon his face. Moses "knew not that his face shone." This second time that he came down from the mountain, he found no golden calf, but he did find the people glad to hear what God wanted them to do.

These stone tables of the Law were in possession of the Israelites for more than nine hundred years, being kept in a sacred casket called "the ark of the covenant," which was a box, three feet, nine inches in length, two feet, three inches in height and width. It was made of precious wood, and covered within and without with plates of gold, while the cover was of solid, beaten gold. There was a golden cherub on either end, and there were golden hooks through which to pass wooden rods overlaid with gold by which to carry it. The ark of the covenant never was seen after King Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Jerusalem in B. C. 602.

Illustration and Application

Surely no one can fail to see how timely is a lesson on the worship of the golden calf, whose substance and shape together represent devotion to creature comfort, which in times of luxury so takes the place of God, that Gladstone regarded it as the chief peril of the Anglo-Saxon race at this period of history.

Three great truths stand out in our lesson story:

1. It is both folly and sin to put any created thing in place of the Creator.
2. In God's scale of sin and punishment not to love God, is treated as the greatest of sins.
3. Loving fellowship with the divine Lawgiver glorifies manhood.

When the people saw that Moses delayed to come down they said, Up, make us gods. Here, the most spiritual worship in which Moses lingered forty days, with God as his "Comrade of the quiet hour," is set in contrast with a worship by forms and symbols, which were intended to be only guide-boards to lead lagging souls to God, but become as gods, halting the soul in idolatry. Rev. Dr. F. E. Clark tells of a Hindu asking him about the image on our coins. "That is our Goddess of Liberty," said the Doctor, with no thought of coming trouble. "Ah," said the Hindu, "I thought you had no gods and goddesses in America." "We do not," said Dr. Clark; "this 'goddess' is only a symbol." "And our images, too," said the Hindu, "are but symbols to point us to God." The story brings out the fact that all idolatry starts in symbolism, intended to help, but often hindering real fellowship of the soul and God. The story may also profit Americans as a reminder, that the devotion of many to "the Almighty Dollar" is a real worship, a guilty idolatry, one that leads not to "liberty," but to slavery. Some one, in satirical recognition of American reverence for the power of money, has suggested a revised edition of the motto on our coins: "The God we trust."

"THE PEOPLE SAT DOWN TO EAT AND TO DRINK AND ROSE UP TO PLAY"

Spirit with Spirit can meet;
Closer is He than breathing,
And nearer than hands and feet.

Tennyson learned that from the Bible, but many professed Christians have never learned it. They find such intellectual and spiritual flights, if not beyond their power, at least beyond their disposition, and so they prefer to walk on the crutches of symbolism. When the preacher is near, they lean on him in a sort of hero-worship, as the Israelites did on Moses. When he is out of sight, they lean on other visible signs of God. Gradually, they put the visible guide or guide-board in place of God. Testing hours prove their devotion was only to the preacher or to the church. When separated from one or both, their piety goes to pieces because not fixed in God. Nothing, not even the Bible, should be to us an object of worship. Our devotion must be personal. Faith is friendship. Jesus searches us with the question: "Lovest thou me?" Again and again for lack of love the Church's faith has fossilized. The Church Moses founded, had fossilized in forms when Jesus came. And the new spiritual Church of Pentecost had fossilized in other forms, before Luther broke through the stony symbols to the God they had hidden, instead of revealing. In many a home, family worship and grace at table are but fossils of a dead faith. The warning in our story is not only against unwarranted religious formalism that hinders devotion, but against God-given forms that are but lamps that we must keep filled with the Spirit.

Aaron made a molten calf. Isaiah ridicules the idol-makers who carve a god out of one end of a log, and burn incense with it to the other. Elijah made great sport on Carmel of the Baal that his people had put in place of God. "Cry aloud, for he is a god—only perhaps he has gone a-fishing or a-hunting, or is asleep and must be awaked." So Aaron also ridiculed the calf which he had made, weakly yielding to a bad "public sentiment," like many a "leader" that does not lead to-day. The inhabitants of many parts of the African coasts worship the shark, and consider its stomach the road to heaven. Three or four times a year they row out and offer the shark poultry and goats to satisfy his appetite. This is not all. A child, which has been specially fattened for this occasion from its birth to the age of ten, is once a year sacrificed to the monster. On the fete day, the unfortunate little victim is bound to a post on a sandy point at low water. As the tide rises the sharks arrive. The child may shriek, and the mother may weep, but it is of no avail. Even its own parent thinks that the horrible sacrifice will ensure her child's entry into heaven.

ANCIENT GOLD CALF

Whatever anyone may think about the status of the heathen who have died, it should be enough to arouse our utmost sympathy and help, that living heathen are even now in hell in this world pursued by fears and terrors and superstitions, and cut off from the light of love and hope that cheers life's dark hours for us.

A little girl from a heathen home had been for a short time attending a missionary school. The idols in her home had been regilded. One day the "Goddess of Mercy" was missing from her place. After some searching it was found in the schoolgirl's bed. When asked how it came there, she explained that she had heard at school that idols were pieces of wood; so she thought she would try for herself if this were so, and she took down the idol to sleep with her, in order that she might see whether it was wise enough to get up out of bed in the morning when she got up. It was rather clever of a little mite of eight years of age, at least so her grandfather thought, and he saved her from the beating her mother was going to give her. But her strange act, and the reason she gave for it, were the subject of talk in the home, and the next Sabbath the whole family came to church.

Shall we not help to put the knowledge of Jesus in place of wooden images in the homes of the brown and yellow and black children of heathen lands?

But let us not forget that the image worship which the Commandments forbids exists to-day in the Roman Catholic Church, and the kindred evil of picture worship in the Greek Church.

There fell of the people that day about three thousand men (verse 28). Ask almost any Sunday School, "What are the greatest sins?" And the answers will be,

God's Estimate of the Sin of Putting Gold in God's Place

"Murder, robbery, adultery." But these are all violations of what Jesus said was the "second" commandment. If the "first" command is to love God, is not the capital crime of the universe not to love God? The question startles us, but two illustrations from home life will help us. Imagine a boy with the best father in town—wise influential, loving—a father who has done everything love could devise for his boy, and imagine that boy saying: "I am honest in money matters, and fair in play with my associates, but I do not, and will not love and obey my father?" Would not that be a case of meanness so great that no secondary virtues could redeem it? Imagine a wife, whose husband had been most faithful and loving for years, saying: "I have paid my bills and dealt fairly with my associates, but I do not, and will not love my husband." Would you say that was a trifling offence, or would it be a supreme sin? It was for such sins God sentenced three thousand worshippers of the golden calf to death. God had brought them out of Egypt, fed them from heaven, watched them like a father, and they put gold in his place in their supreme regard. God does not now punish sins of that kind so severely in this world; but this old record proves that he regards them as exceedingly sinful, and the punishment is still death to the soul.

Moses transfigured! there is the other side—the glory of manhood found in fellowship with God.

Idolatry in our day is also comedy and tragedy combined. The Strand Magazine in 1896 pictured "a job lot of idols," some of which suggested that even the command to make no idol "in the image of anything in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth" was not sweeping enough. One of the images shown seemed to have been pierced by angry worshippers for failing to answer their prayers; but it was really loaded with tokens of high regard, for in West Africa iron is very rare, and is brought as an offering and "hammered into his hallowed stomach." The lack of face in another idol was more than made up in one which was all face, made up of red and yellow feathers and beads and dogs' teeth, that was formerly worshipped in Hawaii. Two small idols, which were also from the Sandwich Islands, where they are no longer worshipped, were "obviously drunk," and one of them showed the usual effect in a banded eye. Another, a tall god from New Guinea, suggested a hungry idiot escaped from a dime museum in search of food.

A Poisonous Drug Still Freely Used.

Many people are brought up to believe that coffee is a necessity of life, and the strong hold that the drug has on the system makes it hard to loosen its grip even when one realizes its injurious effects.

A lady in Baraboo, writes:—"I had used coffee for years; it seemed one of the necessities of life. A few months ago, my health, which had been slowly failing, became more impaired, and I knew that unless relief came from some source, I would soon be a physical wreck. I was weak and nervous, had such sick headaches, no ambition, and felt tired of life. My husband was also losing his health. He was troubled so much with indigestion that at times he could eat only a few mouthfuls of dry bread.

We concluded that coffee was slowly poisoning us and stopped it and used hot water. We felt somewhat better, but it wasn't satisfactory. Finally, we saw Postum Coffee advertised, and bought a package. I followed directions for making carefully, allowing it to boil twenty minutes after it came to the boiling point, and added cream, which turned it to the loveliest rich looking and tasting drink I ever saw served at any table, and we have used Postum ever since. I gained five pounds in weight in as many weeks, and now feel well and strong in every respect. My headaches have gone, and I am a new woman. My husband's indigestion has left him, and he can now eat anything." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Chapter XXXIV.—Hilda Wins

OF course they went to New York, where, in a long conversation with her new friend and adviser, Mrs. Smalley, Hilda disclosed a momentous secret, which she had not as yet seen fit to mention to her husband.

"My dear!" cried Mrs. Smalley with uplifted hands and round eyes of sympathy. "And to think of your being exposed to that frightful ordeal! Oh, I do hope that there will be no permanent bad effects from it—that you will—"

"I shan't care a bit about it," interrupted Hilda comfortably; "If I can live in that lovely house, and have what I want."

"Well, if you don't have your way now, it will be a perfect shame; and with Mr. Rossi's income! Just wait, my dear, I'll manage it. You must see my physician at once!"

That eminent medical man (after a preliminary conversation with Mrs. Smalley), delivered himself of the following weighty opinion in a conference with the young husband: "Your wife, my dear Mr. Rossi, is suffering from the deplorable effects of the terrible shock to her nervous system which she recently experienced. And while I find her to be possessed of an admirable organism—really admirable—I should advise that under the circumstances you do not thwart her in any of the little desires and wishes which she may express, and which are very natural to ladies in her—ah—condition."

When the young man betrayed by his surprised questions his ignorance of the situation, the medical man proceeded to make matters plain to him, repeating with emphasis his advice as to the necessity of yielding "any little prejudices" to the wishes of the patient. "Arguments or questions pertaining to finance had best be avoided altogether for awhile," smiled the man of science. "We must yield our own preferences to the ladies at such times when it is possible, for the benefit of future generations, if for nothing more."

The astute Mrs. Smalley, in a flutter of maternal solicitude, skillfully deepened the impression. "You can't be hard-hearted enough to deny the dear child anything now!" she said, wiping her eyes with an elaborately embroidered handkerchief. "It might result in her death, poor dear!"

Immanuel was stupefied; he gazed mechanically at the motions of Mrs. Smalley's large, white hands, which glittered with a plenitude of precious stones.

"She is just the sweetest, most exquisitely organized creature in the world," cooed that excellent matron. "It is so hard for a man to understand a woman; they are so differently constituted. Dear Hilda—I may call her Hilda, may I not?—has set her heart on living in the Vanderdecken house; such an elegant place, and not far from us. You really must not say no."

Young Rossi said nothing at all for the space of five minutes. His mind was working confusedly on the problem which faced him. A vision of wan young mothers in stifling tenement houses; of puny babes fighting for life in the fetid air of courts and alleys far removed from the stately Vanderdecken mansion, rose before him. He spoke now, very quietly, but with a tremor in his voice which did not escape the vigilant Mrs. Smalley. "I love my wife," he said. And after a pause he repeated the words in a firmer voice. "I love my wife; but I think she can be comfortable and safe—yes, and happy, in a modest house, such as I can afford."

"Afford!" almost screamed Mrs. Smalley, with a hysterical laugh.

"Yes, afford," repeated Immanuel Rossi. "Understand me, if you please; I know that I could buy the Vanderdecken house easily. But I cannot afford to feast in a palace while thousands of my brothers are starving in foul dens, not fit for a decent animal."

"And you will allow your hobby to ride

Juggernaut-like over the bodies of your wife and child?" demanded Mrs. Smalley, in her most impressive, forensic manner. "Do I understand that you refuse to grant the innocent desire of one whom you have vowed to love and cherish above all others?"

It is not strange, perhaps, that the man arose at this juncture, and abruptly left the lady who had spoken these trenchant words. Mrs. Smalley did not seem at all offended by the circumstance. She merely smiled and nodded knowingly to herself. "He'll consent in time!" she said aloud.

By what adroit combination of tears and swoons, and sweet, sad glances, and cold silences and cooing pleadings, Hilda made good this statement, is not recorded. But it is sufficiently well known, being, indeed, a matter of legal documents and civic records, that on a certain day of November, Immanuel Rossi became owner of the long untenanted palace on Fifth avenue, built by one Golet de Peyster Vanderdecken, who had immediately thereafter blown out his brains on board his yacht, for reasons mentioned in select circles with lowered eyelids.

It was a triumph of modern architectural art, was the Rossi mansion, and when its young mistress (in her own carriage, drawn by her own horses, presided over by two solemn-faced men in claret-colored liveries), drew up before its portal on a certain bleak evening in early December, her delicate face glowed bright as the costly flowers that greeted her from every nook and corner of the stately, luxurious rooms. "Oh, Immanuel," she sighed, "how good you are!"

The young man at her side, who had somehow grown strangely old and sad of face in the past weeks, smiled down at her without replying. Indeed, a row of decorous servants, headed by a stately individual who was introduced to the future mistress as Mrs. Brown, the housekeeper, awaited the inspection of the violet eyes.

It was amazing to witness the composure and savoir faire of the country-bred girl in the midst of all this magnificence. If not to the manner born, she was certainly to the manner destined, so Mrs. Smalley averred, in a conversation with one of the grande dames of the second rank, with whom she was intimate.

That lady shrugged her shoulders with a comprehending smile. "We shall watch your career with interest," she said sweetly. "Of course, you will do your prettiest to help the little lady up the social ladder, and follow hard after in the role of cicerone."

"My interest in Mrs. Rossi is that of a mother for her daughter," Mrs. Smalley had replied with hauteur.

Chap. XXXV.—Apples of Sodom

THE descent into Avernus—if such it could be termed—was rapid and amazingly easy after this. Hilda's desires grew like mushrooms in an August night. As Mrs. Smalley, the presiding genius of this particular phase of young Mrs. Rossi's career, would have put it, "the dear child developed astonishingly fast." She acquired in the shortest possible space of time a knowledge of all the appurtenances of a woman of fashion; being clever enough not to trust to her own taste, she soon called to her assistance a swarm of obsequious modistes and milliners, who vied with one another in the pleasing task of assisting the beautiful young wife of the eccentric Mr. Rossi in disposing of some of his superfluous dollars.

After the birth of his son, Immanuel determined upon a last effort to turn the strong current of that life which was to have flowed softly with his own. He sat one evening at twilight in his wife's room, where the two had been looking at the wonderful bit of rose-colored humanity which slumbered peacefully in its nest of lace and flanne. "I should like to call him Moses Armitage," said the young father, venturing to touch with a cautious forefinger one of the tiny pink fists that were thrown up on either side of the downy head.

Hilda called his attention to this attitude, which she assured him was the sign of a very strong child. She had accumulated marvelous stores of maternal knowledge, thought Immanuel, gazing fondly at her beautiful face as she bent over the sleeping child. She was considering his remark with head on one side. "Moses Armitage," she repeated, thoughtfully. "Moses isn't a pretty name; but Armitage Rossi is really elegant. I don't mind if we name him Moses Armitage, if he is never called Moses. When he is grown he can write it M. Armitage Rossi. That sounds quite a la mode, doesn't it?"

"Hilda," he said, "laying his hand on hers, 'are we going to put our whole lives into the effort to be a la mode? Isn't there something better than that for us—and for him?'"

She looked at him coldly. "I do hope," she said, "that you aren't going to talk to me about poor people and slums and all that; I'm not strong enough to bear it."

He opened his lips to reply; then sighed, and glanced once more at the sleeping baby. "We must get the young man into country air as soon as you are strong enough to travel, Hilda," he said gently. "A quiet place will be best, will it not?"

"I've been tiresomely quiet all winter," she pouted. "I don't want to go back to that frightful little house—if that is what you mean. I just could not live there."

"I didn't mean to ask it," he said in a low voice. "But, oh Hilda, it was only last summer that you were willing to live always in the little house with me—and I a poor farmer with only my two hands to work for you."

Her eyes sparkled with vexation, "I never thought of such a thing!" she exclaimed.

"But you married me," he said haltingly. Then stopped short and looked fixedly at the beautiful flushed face. "Did you—know?"

Hilda was frightened; her heart beat uncomfortably fast under the searching gaze of the sombre eyes. "How could I have known?" she cried breathlessly. "But you—deceived me. You ought to have told me—everything!"

It had not before occurred to him that in concealing his wealth from Hilda he had in any way wronged her; it had seemed sweetly justifiable under the circumstances. He looked at her in dismay, the while a mocking memory of past dreams flitted across his mind. After a time he answered, clumsily enough, "I wanted you to love me; not my money."

"You were sufficiently just to yourself," she flashed back; "but you evidently had a poor opinion of me and of women in general, that the idea should have occurred to you."

He felt the justice of her words sufficiently to preserve an uncomfortable silence.

"If you had really been the poor farmer you pretended to be," she went on triumphantly; "of course I should have done my duty under those circumstances. But now I feel that I have some rights as well as those wretched tenement people."

His face darkened. "We will not talk of it," he said. "We were mistaken in each other, that is all."

He rose as if to leave the room, but Hilda sprang after him and laid her hand upon his arm. For the moment—as he seemed slipping away from her—she was sure that she loved him very dearly. "Immanuel," she said pleadingly, "don't be angry with me!"

Of course he melted in a moment before the wistful sweetness of the violet eyes. After all she was more sinned against than sinning, he told himself; besides all that she was his wife and the mother of his son. Before he left the room, he had promised to buy a cottage at Newport, which, the invaluable Mrs. Smalley had assured Hilda, was the "very thing."

The next morning he made good his promise, and also began an extensive purchase of certain vile tenement houses on the north side of the city, paying an exorbitant price for them with a certain grim pleasure. "I will do what I can," he said to himself. But he no longer visited his tenants. The miseries of the poor cut him like a knife in these days.

As the months passed, he became more unhappy than he chose to confess to himself. The gay company which Hilda soon gathered about her in the showy Newport villa, found their host quite "impossible." He found them equally so. Returning one day from a lonely ramble in the country, where he had endeavored to clear his mental skies with but ill success, he found his wife surrounded by a group of fashionably dressed young men, who were making themselves very much at home on his veranda.

To his surprise, he beheld his quondam friend, Robert Livingstone, lolling in a deep chair and apparently overcome by somnolence. The others rallied him on his condition, "Look at Bob! he's calmly taking a nap! Oh, Bobby, you sad dog, to go to sleep when Mrs. Rossi is entertaining us. She won't forgive you in a hurry, will you, Mrs. Rossi?"

Hilda's color brightened. "I guess Mr. Livingstone is sleepy," she said, coquettishly. "I'm sure I'm not offended! Come and have some claret cup, Mr. Livingstone, do!"

The look with which the young man eyed his hostess, and his low bow over the white hand which presented the cup, roused a sleeping doubt in Immanuel's bosom. He walked up the steps slowly, allowing his disagreeable surprise to become evident in the glance which rested upon the group.

Hilda, looking flushed and annoyed, haltingly accomplished several introductions. "Mr. Livingstone, you know already," she concluded, with an uncertain smile at her husband.

"Oh, yes, Rossi and I were exceedingly intimate in our day," said Livingstone, coolly; "haven't seen much of you lately, old man."

"I hope that you will renew your friendship, now that we are down here for the summer," put in Hilda, a little too eagerly; "I saw your mother and sister drive past this morning," she added irrelevantly.

Immanuel flashed a displeased look at her as he murmured some commonplace in reply to Livingstone's words. The other young men, who had been exchanging amused glances, now arose and made their adieux. "Disagreeable duffer," said one, a little too audibly, as they walked away.

Hilda bit her lip and tapped her foot nervously, then with what she considered great savoir faire she turned smilingly to Livingstone, who leaned back lazily in his chair, eyeing the scene with an air of cynical enjoyment. "I do hope," she said prettily, "that I shall have an opportunity of meeting your sister soon. She has such a sweet face."

"Oh, thanks!" drawled Livingstone; "I'm much obliged, I'm sure. She is a sweetly pretty girl, if I do say so."

"And you'll bring her to see me some day?" persisted Hilda.

"Oh, aw—I should be delighted, don't you know," stammered Livingstone, glancing guardedly at the stern, dark profile of Immanuel; "but Sis is really buried in engagements, you know, and I can't promise." He arose as he spoke and took his leave, with profuse apologies for his unceremonious use of "that awfully comfortable chair."

An unpleasant silence followed his departure. Hilda was openly sulky, and Immanuel stared at the drifting sails on the rim of ocean with an impassive face.

"I wish you'd be more social, Immanuel," said the lady at length, speaking with an obvious effort. "You might have asked Mr. Livingstone to dine with us. He belongs to one of the very best old families," she added, quoting with conscious pride from Mrs. Smalley's almanac.

PREACHING AND HEALING*

The Programme of Christianity Includes Care for the Suffering

PITY for the benighted heathen takes a distinctly Christlike form when it prompts an effort to relieve physical suffering, as well as to give spiritual enlightenment. Christ not only spent much of his time in healing disease, but gave his disciples the power to heal and instructed them to use it. In this he is our example, and there is therefore divine authority for training the missionary in medical science. There is, also, as with all Christ's teaching, sound policy in the course he enjoins. The missionary who is skilled in the healing of disease, often finds a welcome to houses from which as a spiritual teacher he would be excluded. The most inveterate opponent of Christianity will appeal to the missionary to treat his sick wife or child, when he would not listen to the preaching of the Gospel; and the acquaintance so formed, often develops into an acceptance of religious teaching. The man who has saved the life of a loved one, or has relieved some dear sufferer of pain, is naturally respected, and his advice on other matters is treated with deference. Therefore directly, as well as indirectly, medical knowledge is valuable to the missionary. He has the gratification not only of relieving suffering—a good thing in itself—but of gaining opportunities of preaching the Gospel.

Another source of gratification is the civilizing influence that is exercised by the intelligent practice of medicine. The heathen are not slow to recognize the philosophic superiority of the white man's system to that of their medicine-men and witch-doctors. Old traditions may induce a man to call in his own tribal doctors, but the most superstitious have their doubts of the efficacy of their remedies, or their accusations of witchcraft, while the white man gains confidence by explaining the reason for administering his medicines, or performing an operation. So the inhuman cruelties practiced on the sick, and the murders of persons accused of having bewitched the sufferer, give place to intelligent treatment, and a vast step is taken in the direction of civilization. The dark places of the earth have one less of the habitations of cruelty, and for this heathendom has to thank the religion of the Great Physician. Dr. George D. Dowkontt, of New York, who has probably done more than any man on earth to equip missionaries with medical knowledge, describes in his Murdered Millions, the horrible practices resorted to in heathen lands for the recovery of the sick, and the list is appalling. He who had compassion on the sufferers of his day, and gladly healed them, must surely be pleased to see those who bear the glad tidings of his Gospel to heathen lands, also relieving the suffering of the people.

Dr. Chamberlain, whose services as a medical missionary in India were wonderfully blessed, relates a pathetic incident of his practice. A Brahman came to him, bringing his daughter for treatment. A difficult operation was performed, the father being present. After it was over and recovery assured, the Brahman prostrated himself before the physician, as he was accustomed to do in worship. Dr. Chamberlain reproved him, and told him that only to God was such adoration due. The Brahman replied, "I do not worship your God, but as he has sent healing to my daughter through you, let my worship go to him through you." Such a man was in a condition to hear more of the Being to whom he felt himself indebted. So it has often been that in our own society the chastened, subdued, grateful soul is more ready to listen to the Gospel at such times than in the hours of joy and prosperity. We are glad that medical missions are coming to better appreciation, and hope that funds may be still more liberally provided for the medical education of more missionaries.

TELL HIM ALL

ART thou weary or forsaken?
Is life's dearest treasure taken?
Art thou ill or sad or lonely?
Go to Jesus—Jesus only—
Tell him all, tell him all.

Is the pathway darkly clouded?
Is thy heart with grief enshrouded?
Know that burdens shall be lifted,
Threatening clouds will all be rifted;
Tell him all, tell him all.

Hast thou met with sore deceiving?
Does thy joy seem past retrieving?
Is there mystery before thee?
God knows—and he watches o'er thee—
Tell him all, tell him all!

CHORUS.

Tell him all, oh, tell him all!
He will hear thy earnest call;
He will make thy sorrow cease,
He will give thee blest release,
He will bring thee sweetest peace,
Tell him all, tell him all, tell him all.

It Led him to the Saviour

Mr. B. S. Prout, of Eveleth, Minn., writes to us as follows:

During the summer of 1895, I secured a subscriber for your paper—THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. This person was a Swede. He could not then read or write English; but he said he liked the pictures. I saw this person a few days ago, and he thanked me very much for inducing him to take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for he said that now he is not only able to read the paper, but it was the means of his conversion, and to-day, instead of cursing the God of our salvation, he praises him continually. He says he intends to have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as long as he lives.

Our Portfolio in India

Writing from Moradabad, India, to relatives in this country, a young missionary worker says:

"Many, many thanks for the Christmas present you sent us. We do enjoy THE CHRISTIAN HERALD so much. We prize it more and more all the time. It is so kind of you to send it. Then, we do appreciate those twelve lovely pictures that came with it this year. We were needing pictures for our house very much. One needs so many pictures to cover these great bare walls of ours, and we brought very few with us. We can get quite pretty frames made here very cheap; so we expect to have all these framed for our home.

"We are just starting on our second year's work in Moradabad. If God gives us health, we are determined to accomplish much more in this needy field this year than we did last. My special work this year is the city schools. I have charge of about twenty small city schools for girls. These are mostly for non-Christian girls. They cannot go to our Christian boarding-schools, because they would break their caste if they lived and ate with Christians. The girls are only taught reading, writing, and simple number work. But this is a great deal for them. If it were not for these mission schools they would have no opportunity for an education at all. In these schools they are given religious instruction, too."

Throw Away the Cumbersome and Costly Plaster-of-Paris and Sole-Leather Jackets

Our appliance is light in weight, durable, and conforms to the body as not to evidence that a support is worn. It is constructed on strictly scientific anatomical principles, and is truly a godsend to all sufferers from spinal troubles, male or female. We also make Scientific Appliances for protruding abdomen, weak back, stooping shoulders. Send for free booklet and letters from physicians, physical instructors, and those who know from experience of our wonderful appliances. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Write to-day for measurement blank. Don't wait.

WESLEYVILLE, PA. I am permanently relieved of a weak and deformed spine, by the use of the Philo Hurt Company's Appliance. During the six months previous to procuring the appliance, I was unable to stand on my feet. After wearing it for six weeks, I could walk with the aid of crutches, and eight months from the time I first commenced the use of the Brace, I was able to do as much work as any able bodied man. My experience has convinced me that spinal trouble is the cause of many symptoms of disease, that can never be relieved by treating the symptoms, and nothing but some support to remove the weight of the head and shoulders from the spine will give relief. I cannot say too much for your Appliance; they are so light and comfortable (and can be removed so easily) that it is almost a pleasure to wear one.

Christ's Prophecies

The Order of Events Deduced from our Lord's Eschatological
Discourses

JUST as Christ gave his final word to the unbelieving Jews until he returns again, in the 23d chapter of Matthew, so, also, he gives his final instruction to his disciples concerning the events at the time of the end in the twenty-fourth chapter, and he speaks through these disciples to the whole Church until the end comes.

Having answered the first question as to when the Lord should come, and having deferred the time for a long and indefinite period, he begins to answer the second question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming?"

The Old Testament knew nothing about the intervening space between the rejection of Christ and his coming in glory. What he said of this intervening period had no parallel passage in the Old Testament to which he might refer. But when he speaks about the things which immediately precede his coming, he necessarily touches upon events that are plainly revealed in the Old Testament Scriptures. Isaiah, Daniel and Zechariah all speak of the time when the Jews are in Jerusalem, and also of a state of unbelief just before the Messiah comes.

In the first part of this prophecy, he tells them what are not the signs, but in the second part he speaks of the tribulation and the abomination of desolation as the constituted signs of the coming of that glorious event. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days" appear the signs in the heavens, to be followed by the personal coming of the "Lord himself"—the very "coming" after which the disciples earnestly inquired—his coming to take them to himself—and reveal himself to the Jews ready to receive him. As the time of unequalled tribulation and the appearing of the Son of Man have not taken place, it follows that the abomination of desolation has not been set up.

Immediately after that period of unequalled tribulation comes the time of signs in sun and moon and stars, and in the shaking heavens. As soon as we get to this point, we are again side by side with what is made known in Luke as taking place after the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled, after the dispersion of Israel is ended, and after Jerusalem is rebuilt. The "Day of the Lord" enters into history by means of these signs. Following them is the sign of the Son of Man himself, and all tribes of the land mourning, and then the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. Both Matthew and Luke close thus: "But when these things begin to come to pass, look up and lift up your heads"—literally, unbend and lift up your heads—"because your redemption draweth nigh." This is enforced by the parable concerning the fig tree, with the budding of its leaves, indicating the approach of summer. "Even so ye also, when ye see these things coming to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh." In Matthew it is, "Know that he is nigh, even at the doors." The two scriptures link together the coming of the Lord and the manifestation of his kingdom as taking place at the same time, and this corresponds with the teachings of our Lord in other places.

Let it be settled, that Jesus meant that these events would all be fulfilled before the new generation of them that fear the Lord should come upon the scene; that the generation of hard-hearted and unbelieving Jews should be preserved; that the generation of religious ritualists, of unbelieving rationalists and of time-serving nationalists should be preserved; that the generation of God-hating, Satan-serving and sin-loving men would continue to exist until all these things should be fulfilled. After that would come the Messianic age in victory, with its new generation of regenerated men and with its period of protracted righteousness and peace.

And what will be the condition of the great world-wide sphere of Christendom outside of Palestine at that time? This is made known in the four parables following, viz., the servant over the household; the wise and foolish virgins; the used and buried talents; the flock of sheep and goats. The words, "Then shall the Kingdom of Heaven be like," fixes the time and determines the application of these parables. These parables give a picture at the time of the end of that "Kingdom of Heaven" outlined in the seven parables of the 13th of Matthew.

He says then, during the period of tribulation when society resembles the antediluvian and Sodomite times—then the Kingdom of Heaven, or Christendom, that is our existing dispensation, shall be like the wise and the foolish virgins, etc. That will be the moral spect of the whole professing Church, for the "Kingdom of Heaven" is not a mere Jewish or Palestinian affair. It is commensurate with the whole field of total missionary work, and this is the view presented by the whole of these four concluding parables. Every one of them teaches that the whole field will be pervaded with false profession and the practice of evil at the end. As for the world, it will have a mad and wicked revelry, filled with corruption and violence as in the days of Noah; and it will be abandoned to the most abominable and beastly lust as in the days of Lot. Even within, in the households of faith, in the place of blessing and amongst the guides and rulers of the family of God, we see, side by side with the "wise and faithful servant," the "wicked servant." The one gives to each his portion of meat in due season, while the other takes advantage of his knowledge that the Lord "delays" his coming, and acts in cruelty toward the household, while debauching with the world—"feeding himself and not sparing the flock." Such will be the character of ministry "then," at the end of the age.

Soon the tares shall be gathered out, and all things that offend and them that do iniquity shall be removed from the kingdom on earth and cast into the furnace of fire. "There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Side by side on the earth there will still remain, after this removal of "tares," the "wheat," or children of God, and the apostates who have yielded to the Anti-christ during his reign and persecution. "Then shall two men be in the field; the one shall be taken and the other left; two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one taken and the other left. Watch ye, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come."

The Infidel's Wager

THIS remarkable story is related by the Rev. Dr. Cheever: A young man named Thorpe, who afterwards became an effective minister of that Gospel which at first he ridiculed, was one of Mr. Whitefield's most insulting opposers; and possessing an unusual talent for mimicry, he not only interrupted his sermons in public, but ridiculed them in private in convivial theatrical circles.

On one occasion, at such a gathering for revelry and wit, he and three of his companions laid a wager for the most effective imitation and ridicule of Whitefield's preaching. Each was to open the Bible at random, and deliver an extempore harangue from the first verse that presented itself, and the audience, after the profane exhibition, were to adjudge the prize.

Thorpe's three competitors each went through the game with impious buffoonery, and then it came to his turn. They had the table for their rostrum; and as he was about to step upon it, confident of his superior ability, Thorpe exclaimed, "I shall beat you all." They handed him the Bible, and when he opened it the invisible providence of God directed his eye at the first glance to the verse in the thirteenth chapter of Luke's Gospel—"Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

He read the words, but the moment he had uttered them he began to see and feel their full import. The Sword of the Spirit in that passage went through his soul as a flash of lightning. An instantaneous conviction of his own guilt as a sinner before God seized hold upon him; and his conscience was fearfully aroused. The retribution in that passage he felt was for himself, its terrors glared upon him; and out of that rapid and overwhelming conviction he preached. His fervor and fire increased as he went on, the sympathetic gloom of his audience deepened the convictions in his own soul, and the sentences fell from his lips with such intense and burning imagery, and with such point and power of language, that, as he afterward stated, it seemed to him as if his own hair would stand erect with terror at their awfulness. Yet no man interrupted him, for all felt and saw, from the solemnity of his manner, what an overwhelming impression there was upon him; and though their astonishment gradually deepened into anger, yet they sat spellbound, listening and gazing at him. And when he had finished, a profound silence reigned in the whole circle, and not one word concerning the wager was uttered.

Thorpe, after a season of the deepest distress and conflict, passed into the full light of the Gospel, and at length became a most successful preacher of its grace.

There are 350 best old and new songs, duets, trios, and quartets. The volumes are richly illustrated with 400 portraits, many of them being handsome chromatic art plates printed in many colors. 2,200 Pages of Sheet Music

The volumes are crowded with the best selections for every occasion. There are 2,200 pages of sheet music, which would cost, if purchased one piece at a time, more than $200.00. Gives His Millions to the Poor

THE "Age of Magnificent Charities" is perhaps the term by which future historians will describe our times. No fifty years in this world's record of the centuries can show such royal giving to good causes as has that in which we live. The rich have given their millions; and into the Lord's treasury, the widow's mite of the poor—thrice-blessed tribute!—has flowed with unexampled freedom. Causes humanitarian, educational, religious—anything by which man helps his fellow-man—have but to be brought to popular attention for men to make haste to fulfill the command laid on us by our great Elder Brother two thousand years ago, when he bade us love our neighbors, and showed us that our neighbor is him that hath need of us. Nay, rich men now do not wait for such need to be brought to their notice. They go about looking for it, and show by their actions that they consider the best investment for gold its application according to the Golden Rule.

An example of this spirit (commented upon editorially in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD), which, accustomed as New York is to mammoth benevolences, fairly startled the metropolis, because of the peculiar circumstances attending it as well as the magnitude of the donation, was the transfer by Mr. John M. Burke of his entire estate, valued at $4,000,000, to a corporation, who will hold it in trust for the relief of worthy persons temporarily disabled from self-support. The corporation was organized by Mr. Burke himself; it consists of ex-Mayor Abram S. Hewitt, William H. White, Edward M. Shepard, and F. K. Sturgis, trustees, with Mr. Burke as President, and Frederick H. Denman, his attorney, as Secretary. A novel scene was that in the lawyer's office, in the big building, 170 Broadway, where business men gathered about the philanthropist, and affixed their signatures to the formal legal document, which set forth in technical terms, the fact that a rich man was giving his millions to the poor.

The title of the corporation is the Winifred Masterton Burke Relief Foundation, Winifred Masterton Burke being the name of Mr. Burke's mother, who died thirty years ago. Mr. Burke is long past three score and ten. The statement has been made that he celebrated his ninetyeth birthday by instituting this noble memorial to his mother. He does not look his years; he might be better taken for a well-preserved man of seventy than for a nonagenarian. He is vigorous in mind and body; his eye is bright, and under his clear skin the blood comes and goes as on the cheek of youth. He has led a simple, natural life, likes outdoor exercise, and is particularly fond of long walks. He abhors display, has never kept a carriage, nor given other evidences of wealth, and his nearest neighbors were astounded when, in reading the story of his fortune being signed away, they realized for the first time that they had had a millionaire among them. His home, a brown-stone front, at 18 West Forty-second street, is in no particular more pretentious than those around it. His life in Nantucket, where, as a rule, his summers are spent, is as unostentatious as in New York. He is one of the most modest and unassuming of men. Mr. Burke is a member of the Episcopal Church. His charities, hitherto, have been unobtrusive as his life; until the deeding away of his property, his philanthropy was as little recognized as his wealth. His earnest desire was that this final act of benevolence should remain a secret between himself and associates, but this was manifestly impossible. Mr. Burke has contemplated the step he has just taken a long time. He has never married, has no near relatives, and has chosen to consider the poor his kindred. The deed gives the trustees broad powers, and specifies that:

"The benefits of the foundation shall be reserved for intelligent and respectable men and women who, in consequence of sickness, or discharge from hospitals before they have regained strength sufficient to earn their livelihood, or in consequence of other misfortune, may be in need of temporary assistance."

An office is to be maintained in New York City, where application for aid may be made. The deed provides for investigation of cases, but declares: "The founder, appreciating the frequent suffering caused by tardy action in giving relief, urges that the methods to be used shall be as expeditious as possible."

A convalescents' home will be the first building erected. The need here of a commodious institution of this character is well known. Hospitals are usually full to overflowing; and the patient, well of his disease but needing rest for recovery of strength, must give place to the patient who is ill unto death. Provision will be made for ailing children not proper subjects for existing hospitals, and for supplying nurses at a moderate cost, to families having cases requiring special treatment, under the supervision of the attending physician. For benefit rendered, the deed says: "A moderate charge may be made; but in case the patient prefers, it shall be regarded as a loan, to be repaid without interest and without security." Mr. Burke's purpose is not to increase pauperism, by helping any who should help themselves. Aid is to be extended, as a rule, to those who have maintained themselves, and who expect to do this again. Co-operation with charitable organizations already in existence, and with the municipality, whenever this seems advisable, is contemplated.

Mr. Burke disclaims any idea that he has impoverished himself by his munificence. By his present course he has inaugurated in his lifetime, a work that under a will would only begin to take form after his death. As long as he lives, the income from the property deeded to the corporation, less current expenses for administration, is reserved to him; nor, say his lawyers, has he conveyed to the corporation everything he possesses. His faithful, gray-haired housekeeper, who has looked after his comfort for many years, is provided for in the terms of the deed.

Mr. Burke has known what struggle and toil mean, and is in a position to sympathize with those who must make their own way. When a lad of sixteen he went to work for a shipping and trading firm in New York, his native city; applied himself diligently, and, presently, had a ship of his own, and opened a business for himself between this port and South America. Soon his argosies were sailing the seas, and all that he did prospered. Some years ago he retired from business, and since then, his problem has been to devise some way by which his wealth could best serve his fellow-man. Upon announcement of the transfer, the aged philanthropist's house was so besieged by people pleading all sorts of needs, that attention to them all was impossible, and Mr. Burke had simply to refer inquirers and applicants of every description to Mr. Denman. "We hope the CHRISTIAN HERALD will emphasize the fact," said Mr. Denman, "that the work can not be in active operation for over a year." A committee of experts on plan and scope is being formed by the trustees to co-operate with their own body. Mr. Burke intends this work to be undenominational; the Foundation, regarding all men as brothers, will minister to them in Christ-like spirit, irrespective of race and creeds.

Mr. Moody's Idea of Confession

Mr. Moody, who had wide experience and great success in dealing with wrongdoers, taught that "The confession should be as public as the sin." He declared, also, "God can't forgive you unless you confess to the persons you have wronged, and are willing to make it right." F. S. MERSHON.

Will It Do Good or Harm?

It depends upon the good or harm that will be accomplished thereby. Generally speaking, the Valley of Humiliation is good for the soul; but there is, in the human mind, a tendency to morbid thought, which must be fought and kept in the background in order to have the present give all its possible opportunities for development. We do not grow nor thrive in the dark cellars of despair, discouragement and dissatisfaction, but in the cheery gardens of hope, faith, determination. But there are times and cases where, although restitution cannot be made, public welfare will be aided, and warning doors should be held open to all who might be tempted to do the same thing, for are we not all one family? We owe something to others, as well as to ourselves, and logic will help solve the question as to what is right, and what is best to do in any given case. Ask: "Will public confession do good or harm? In what way for either?" Seek the greatest good to the greatest number, and in the Father's name do what he would approve. Then, even at the expense of temporary humiliation, a public confession will be an instrument for good, and not merely of torture, which too many confessions are.

L. A. Y.

(Author of "Preston Papers.")

The Benefits of Confession

There is no law in Scripture requiring public confession in such a case, nor does justice or expediency demand it; yet it is easy to conceive a case in which the sense of guilt so weighs upon a man's conscience, that it is a relief to him to confess it, and the more publicly the better. Witness the late occurring instances of criminals confessing their crimes, and giving themselves up to justice. Yes, and we think public confession might sometimes be made from a higher motive. It

Public Confession would be Harmful

No. Sin is, first, between the wrongdoer and God; second, between the wrongdoer and the party wronged. If the wrongdoer has repented sincerely and received full forgiveness, his sin is removed "as far as the east is from the west," and where "restitution is impossible," a public confession would be harmful, because it would reduce the wrongdoer in the eyes of his friends and the world, and make it all the harder for him to do right. Since he is at peace with God, and since he cannot right the wrong done, his duty is fulfilled.

M. L. GOSS.

Conscience Should Decide

When a wrongdoer has repented, even though restitution be impossible, he may relieve his conscience and strengthen his good resolutions, besides doing much to restore confidence in himself, if he confesses his sin to those he has wronged, telling them he has sought divine forgiveness, and been forgiven. On the other hand, he fecting a community or a church, the confession must be equally broad. If the sin has been open, flagrant and long-continued, a public confession of the sin and profession of repentance is the proper thing. And, in every instance, the sincerity of the confession and repentance must be demonstrated by utter abandonment of the sin, and such restitution as the case permits. A tender conscience will prompt the penitent to do the right thing.

Miscellaneous Questions

S. E. DeG., St. Remy, N. Y. If, through dissensions between pastor and members, the attendance on a church's services materially decreases, and the minister declines to resign, what is the church's duty in the case?

No advice can be given in such a case unless all the circumstances are definitely and fairly stated. Investigation would probably show faults on both sides. If a faction, not representing the majority nor the best interests of the church, is endeavoring to oust the pastor; or if the latter is, for any reason, giving occasion for strife and division among the members, the facts should be formally presented before a properly constituted board or session, representing the whole congregation, and proper action should be taken.

G. C., Oswego, Kan. The suggestion that our missionary boards should select natives from heathen lands to be evangelized and educated, in order that such natives might become missionaries to their own people, is not a new one. The plan is followed extensively by all the missionary societies, and some of the brightest and most efficient missionaries have thus been developed. It is not, however, wise to work in any field without white missionaries at the head of the work, as experience has shown that they are absolutely necessary. In native hands exclusively, the work is soon apt to degenerate, for various reasons, which cannot be enumerated here.

M. B. W. Should the host or the guest first propose that the guest retire?

It is customary for the host, at a reasonable hour, to ask the guest if he or she wishes to retire, and then to offer to show the way to the room, leaving it optional with the guest to retire at that time or later.

Reader. What is the most reliable estimate of the daily average mortality throughout the world?

We have submitted this question to the editor of the Medical Record, New York, who kindly supplies the following answer:

"Perhaps as good an answer as any is that given in Dunglison's Medical Dictionary, under the title, 'Mortality'. Assuming that the population of the earth is $1,000,000,000, and that the entire population is renewed once in every thirty-three years, the number of deaths a day will be 82,191."

Miss. M. A., Clarks River, O. Does a person receive forgiveness if he confesses his sin to God, but will not right it with his fellow men?

We are distinctly taught that we must forgive, as we hope to be forgiven. See Gen. 50: 17; Matt. 18: 35; Mark 11: 25; Luke 6: 37; 11. Cor. 2: 10, and other passages.

The beautiful poem, entitled "Satisfied," which appeared in a recent issue of this journal, was the work of Harriet W. Vail, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

Mrs. J. W. C., Buckley, Ill. If we pray amiss—that is, pray selfishly, or with a view to the gratification or indulgence of any feeling or sentiment or purpose, which God does not approve—we should not be surprised at the denial of our petitions. Besides, there are many ways in which earnest and acceptable prayer may be answered besides the way in which we, with our narrow vision and poor human wisdom, may expect it to come.

THE ANCESTRAL HOME OF WILLIAM PENN, STOKE POGIS, ENGLAND

Stoke Pogis Manor House, within a short distance of both London and Windsor, is the scene of many pilgrimages by those who are lovers of poetry, as the quaint village and its ancient church are said to have furnished the inspiration for "Gray's Elegy." Stoke Pogis was the ancestral home of William Penn, and thus it possesses a still greater claim upon the attention and interest of American visitors. The founder of Pennsylvania lived in the old Manor House, which is a curious, mediaeval-looking structure, exceedingly picturesque and romantic in appearance, and, even at this late date, fairly well preserved.

might be made in order to magnify God's for giving grace. The Apostle Paul told the story of his wicked life over and over again, but his main object was to show how great was the mercy that redeemed him.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

Confession Uncalled For

In a case like this, where restitution is impossible, a public confession is uncalled for. It lies between the wrongdoer and God. The sin is confessed and forgiven. What does it matter about the opinion of the world? This wrongdoer may show the public that he is penitent, by living an honest, upright, Christian life.

LAURA S. MORLEY.

A Changed Life, the Best Confession

No! It is doubtful how much good the confession of Augustine or of an opium-eater have done. Private confession and outward transformation of conduct are helpful. Advertising one's failures is used by Satan to drag multitudes into shame of a similar sort. It is unwise to describe the "wild oats" that have been sown. A changed life is the best confession that can be made in public. The world has long discounted public confessions.

CLAUDE M. SEVERANCE.

may do much harm by an open confession. One must always think of the result of his example. He alone, knowing all the circumstances within and without (or some wise friend with such knowledge), is capable of reaching the true answer, and having the conscience to repent, should also have the conscience to carefully and prayerfully think out the best way to the right issue.

MARY SPAULDING HATCH.

Concealment would be Cowardice

If it is impossible to make restitution, although he has confessed to God and received forgiveness, it is not known to the public that he has repented; so, for example's sake, he should publicly acknowledge it, else he will still be considered guilty. His moral courage will be strengthened by confession, and the humiliation will cause him to be less likely to sin again. It would be cowardly to try to conceal his repentance.

SARAH A. FALL.

Conscience Will Prompt Aright

Confession must be first of all to God, and restitution to him by forsaking all sin. If the offence be private or personal, affecting one individual or family, confession may be made to those injured. If the offence be wider, af-

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

Four Generations in the Pulpit

REV. JOHN SPURGEON, FATHER OF THE LATE PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON, DIES IN HIS NINETY-SECOND YEAR

TRULY a remarkable family has been that of the Spurgeons, a member of which has just been called to his reward, after nearly a century of life. He was the representative of the second generation of consecrated men who, for more than a century, have been preaching the Gospel. Four generations in the direct line from father to son have been ministers, and the fourth generation is represented by Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, who succeeded his father as minister of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London. The Spurgeon family is of Dutch descent. The persecution of the Duke of Alva, in the Sixteenth century, came pastor of the Independent Chapel at Stambourne. He lived to the age of eighty-eight, and to the last was a deeply earnest and devoted minister. He was the grandfather of the famous Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

The representative of the family whose death is now reported was John Spurgeon, son of the Stambourne minister and father of the famous pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle. John was born in 1810, and had consequently attained the age, when he died recently, of ninety-two years. He chose a business career and succeeded in accumulating a small fortune. He was living at Kelvedon when his two sons, Charles and James,

His ninety years were telling upon him, and at last the heart, which had been so full of love and tenderness, ceased to beat, and the venerable servant of the Lord went to his reward.

It is several years since his wife, who had been his devoted companion through his long life, was laid to rest. She had rejoiced with him, in the world-wide usefulness of their son Charles. Her denominational preferences were never reconciled to the latter, leaving the denomination of the family to become a Baptist. She wrote him once that from his birth she had prayed that he might be a minister, but never that he might be love the family out of the Low Countries, and they found a refuge in Great Britain. There, they lived a quiet, godly life, inconspicuous but honest, hard-working, and consistent. They adhered to the principles which had been the cause of their exile, and fearlessly declared their faith. One of them, Job Spurgeon, encountered persecution. There is a record of the reign of Charles II., which shows that in 1677, Job Spurgeon was arrested for preaching the Gospel, and was confined and sent to Chelmsford Jail, where he lay for seven weeks suffering extreme privation. In 1776, was born at Halstead, Essex Co., James Spurgeon, who be-were born. A picture of the humble home he occupied at the time appears on this page. But the ministerial strain in the Spurgeon blood would not allow him to continue in business. He preached occasionally in the villages around his home, and with so much success that he was urged to devote himself exclusively to the work. It was not, however, until middle life that he could see his way to becoming a minister. There was a struggling church at Tollesbury, which had a difficulty in maintaining a regular pastor. John Spurgeon was greatly in request at the church for a pulpit supply, and eventually he was led to give up his business and become its minister. For fourteen years, he labored there with many tokens of blessing, and had the satisfaction of seeing the church grow into prosperity. He took charge then of a church at Cranbrook, which was in similar circumstances, and with a like result. His next sphere of labor was in London, where he became pastor of the famous church at Fetter Lane, from which he subsequently removed to Old Islington Chapel, in the north of London, where he labored until extreme old age. During the past few years he gave his chief attention to the famous Stockwell Orphanage, established by his son Charles. He seemed to enjoy above everything being among the children there. They all loved him and venerated him. After the death of the founder, in 1892, the children transferred to the venerable pastor the affection they had for his eminent son. His health continued good to the end. Both his sons, Charles and James, died, but he lived on, sturdily doing his good work and rejoicing to see his grandsons carrying on the traditions of the family—Thomas, as his father's successor at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and Charles, at his church at Greenwich. Only during the past few weeks did he appear to lose his interest in life.

a Baptist. Charles replied in the humorous way characteristic of him, telling his mother that she should rejoice that God had been better to her than her prayers, and had done more for her than she had asked. She loved him too well to oppose him.

In a country where so much importance is attached to pedigree, the two men who now represent the family in the pulpit have a right to take pride in their long and honorable descent. Before such a record of father, grandfather, and great grandfather, all servants of Christ, the nobles who boast of their descent from robber barons may well envy them.

PASTOR C. H. SPURGEON

DR. JAMES A. SPURGEON

REV. CHAS. SPURGEON

PASTOR THOMAS SPURGEON

A DESERT place! What does that mean? Is Christ bidding his disciples follow him over a great sea of sand? Does he want his companions to lose themselves among the endless dunes, and live where neither beast nor bird nor fish nor insect can live? Does he desire them to be terror-stricken at the moanings of the simoons, or to be smothered in one of those awful desert wind-storms, and be there as completely lost as the merciless ocean can swallow down a shipwrecked crew, and leave no trace where the watery jaws have opened and shut? No. Christ is not here alluding to a Mesopotamian or a Persian or a Sahara Desert of sand. Christ is practically saying to his disciples who are physically and mentally worn out from too much work, "Come, let us go out into the country where we can be alone. Let us go among the hills where we shall be separated from these throngs of people who are continually following us to be physically healed and spiritually fed. Let us go off alone, where we shall hear only the rustling of the leaves and the singing of the birds and the rippling of the brooks. Let us hie away into nature's haunts, where we can see the deer playing in the valleys, and where we can stumble through the wild vines growing at our feet. Let us go away to the place where the shepherd leads his flocks among the fresh green pasture lands."

Every human body needs the recuperation of physical rest. When Daniel Webster made his last visit to John Adams, the aged ex-president said: "I am as well as any man of nearly ninety years could expect to be. I find I am afflicted with an incurable disease called old age. My spirit is occupying a very shaky tenement. And as far as I can make out, sir, the Landlord does not intend to make any more repairs." That statement of John Adams was figuratively right, and yet literally wrong. The human body, which was once created out of dust, is being recreated up to the very brink of the grave. We eat and drink and rest in order to give nourishment and strength to the bones, the muscles and the flesh. And rest is just as essential for the physical recreation as food and water and light.

Nature's Demand

The purpose of this sermon is to show that every hard-working Christian, at least once a year, should go out into the country and take a vacation, a prayerful rest, the same as Jesus' disciples, who left their work to take a rest. It is every Christian's duty at least once a year to leave the home, the store, the factory, and have a complete change of scene and food. When Phoebe Cary came to die, looking up at her physician, she said, "Doctor, you can do nothing for me. The reason I am dying, is because for years I would never take a rest. Even when I went off into the country I always took my books and pen and worked." Thousands and tens of thousands of the best brains and hearts of the pulpit, the bar, the medical office, and of all the Christian departments of life, have simply killed themselves in their young manhood and womanhood because they would not obey Christ's command and take a rest.

I beg of you, hardworking Christian men and women, to leave behind the office, the factory, the home and the pulpit, and go off this summer into the country and rest a while, because those men and women whom Satan cannot destroy by sin he will try to kill by overwork.

Satan is a great strategist. He rarely attacks his enemies in the places where he thinks they are invulnerable. He is always trying new schemes and plans. When Satan finds a true Christian who is consecrated to God's service, he immediately calls together his demoniac lieutenants and says: "That man must be stopped in his career of good works. Those lips of his must be closed. That hand must be made helpless. That pure heart must be struck by some poisonous arrow. That foot of his must be led along the stony path of sin." No vision of earth can arouse Satan into such a frenzied passion as the sight of a good man consecrating his years to good works. So Satan, when he sees a good man consecrating his life to good deeds, immediately dispatches his angels of temptation. First, Satan offers to that good man all the allurements of popular applause and worldly pleasures. The spirit of temptation does not come like a wrinkled old hag, with her bony hands changed into the shape of an eagle's claw, which can be used to kill as well as tear away the quivering flesh. But the spirit of temptation comes in the form of the evil spirit like that which the artist once painted. He drew the spirit of temptation as a beautiful angel. Her lips were wreathed in smiles. Her hair had hidden in it the brilliant colors of the setting sun. Her lap was full of flowers. Her couch was the rim of a cloud, while under the shadow of her flowing robes crouched the demoniac form of death. So Satan tries to destroy the good man by adulation, by applause. By his very successes, Satan tries to turn his humble heart of love into a vain heart of sin.

Then, if Satan finds that worldly applause and the wine cup and the midnight carousal do not stop the career of the good man who has consecrated his life to good deeds, he tries another mode. He says: "I will unkenel and unleash all the bloodhounds of persecution and misrepresentation and slander, and turn them upon the good man's track. I will let this pack of demoniac bloodhounds bury their white teeth into his limbs. I will let these bloodhounds leap upon him and try to tear out his heart. Ah, I have made many a good man, on account of slander, turn and curse God. Perhaps I can destroy this man in this way."

Killed by Overwork

But after Satan has tried to destroy this good man by both popular applause and by the hounds of persecution and slander, and has failed, Satan has one way left. Satan says to himself: "I cannot make that man give up his God, but I can kill him with overwork. I can pile the Christian opportunities of usefulness upon that brilliant, consecrated, young Gospel minister. I will keep him working during the day and during the night. I will keep him working during the winter and during the summer. I will give him a bigger church than he can attend to. I will have the editors write him to send articles for their papers. I will have the summer camp meetings steal away his vacation. I will start a revival in his church. I will sap every bit of physical strength he has. I will kill him by overwork as I killed Kirke White, by offering him a Cambridge prize. I will kill him as I killed William Paley, at thirty-nine years of age, the most brilliant Christian intellect of his day. I will kill him as I have burned out the brain of many a genius by overwork, before that brain lived long enough to light an intellectual torch which would have cast its rays all round the world."

When Satan sees a wife and a mother consecrating her life to the Master's service, he says, "I must stop her also. I must kill her by overwork, if I cannot do it in any other way." So Satan tells that wife and mother that she must do all the sewing. She must do all the work in the kitchen. She must look after her husband's interests in every way. He may be able to smoke his cigars, and have a horse, and go to the club; but she must be a good wife and keep every expense down. She must never leave home and take a vacation herself, although her husband can go off a-fishing every spring. The result is, Satan drives that woman on and on and on by overwork, until he drives her into the grave. Then Satan laughs a mighty laugh of triumph. He now has full swing in that motherless and wifeless household. The sons and daughters of that mother are easily led off into sin. Why? At the critical time of their lives the mother's hand is not there to guide them. The husband and the father having lost his wife's ballast becomes financially and spiritually wrecked. All those catastrophes come upon that dead woman's home because she would not let up in her work. She would not take a rest, a complete rest, away from home, which every hard-working Christian woman needs at least once a year.

Disregarded Warnings

Now, my friends, you know that what I am saying is true. You know that some of the best people, the most Christian people, and the people whom we could least afford to lose, have shortened their lives and gone forth and laid down in their graves merely because they would not obey Christ's command, and go into a desert place and rest awhile. You have had many premonitions of sickness. You know that you are carrying too heavy a load. The doctors tell you that you are overworked. You had better hold up. For your children's sake, and your husband's sake, or your wife's sake, you had better go out into the country and rest. You say you cannot stop and rest. You could stop for a case of typhoid fever. You could stop in order to attend your own funeral. God does not want you to lay down your burden of life until your work is ended. Better rest up while there is yet time.

I beg of you, hard-working Christian men and women, to take a summer vacation, because a rested brain can do twice as much work in the same time as a tired one. Some two or three years after I entered the ministry, my father wrote me a letter something like this: "Dear Frank, I hear you intend to stay in the city this summer, and take no vacation. You say that you cannot afford the time. Great mistake. If you attempt to work all summer you will have to pay a big price for disobeying nature's laws. Next winter the sermon which you write will be harder to produce, and poorer, because you have a tired brain. Get out of the city by all means. You owe this rest to your family, your church and your God. A sick or tired minister is of but little use in his study, in the prayer meeting, or in his pulpit. I always find that when my brain is rested it does its quickest and best work." That is the kind of a letter which every sensible father will write to his son when he finds that the boy does not know the well-known axiom, that a rested brain and a rested body can do twice as much work as a tired physical organization.

The Blessings of VACATION

TEXT—Mark 6:31 } "Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place and rest a while"

Every physician will tell you that it is an economy in time for tired men and women to go off and take a vacation and rest. Yet it is a surprising fact how many truly good Christian people feel they cannot leave their home and church work, even for a few weeks in a year. If they were rested they could do much more work for Christ, and do it much more easily. Indeed, the older I grow the more I believe that most good people need to take this advice. Most good people look tired. Where you will, in the store, or in the home, and the on great complaint that you hear every spring and summer is, "I am so tired, awfully tired. I am as tired when I get up in the morning as when I lie down to sleep at night." Why, most people in the springtime look as tired as that poor woman who came to me one day and said, "Mr. Talmage, don't talk to me about heaven. do not want to go to heaven for a long time yet. I am so tired, that when I come to die in my grave for a thousand years. Then, after have become thoroughly rested, I want to open my eyes and see heaven." My overworked Christian friend, if you want to do your best work for Christ next winter you must treat your body just as you would treat a tired, run down, exhausted horse which has been worked all winter. You would take off his shoes and turn him out to grass. You must treat your body as a farmer treats a field which has been overworked in production. He lets it lie fallow for awhile. You should treat your body as nature treats the vegetation. It sends the colds of winter so that all the forces of the tree can lie dormant. As a Christian worker for next winter you will have so much to do, what you need now to enable you to do your next winter's duty, is no medicine but rest; complete physical and mental rest. The same kind of a rest which Christ gave to his disciples when he led them off into a desert place.

I Want God to Let Me Sleep

I beg of you, hard-working Christian men and women to rest awhile, because a summer vacation ought not to cost you financially very much. Christ did not tell his disciples to spend weeks and months in order to get up an expensive wardrobe so they could go to a fashionable hotel. He did not want them to go to a great watering-place, where they could drink and carouse and turn night into day, and day into night. He did not desire that they should go to a place where they would have to be dressed up all the time. To some people, the idea of taking a summer vacation is not to find rest but dissipation. From the time they arrive at the fashionable summer resort they defy every physical law of health. And if, after a few weeks of carousal they return to the city with the fatal germs of disease or invalidism planted in their vitals, they have no one to blame but themselves. They will be just as much to blame for their oncoming sicknesses as my dissipated classmate was blamed by the professor. He asked for a sick leave. The professor looked at him a moment and said, "No, sir, I will not excuse you. You are young and strong. You have been disobeying the laws of nature and you must suffer the consequence. You have no business to be sick." So these summer dissipators will find, much to their sorrow, that no man or woman ever found physical rest in a fashionable hotel by dancing until one or two in the morning. No man ever found health at the summer gaming table in the hotel bar-rooms.

Economical Resting-Places

The fashionable watering-places are very expensive places in which to live. But when Jesus bade his disciples to go into a desert place and rest a while, I commanded them to go into the quietude of the country. One can live very cheaply in the rural districts. It does not cost very much to go into the suburbs of the city and live for a little while next to nature's heart; dwell in some quiet farmhouse far away from the great busy world. It does not cost very much to associa-for a little while with the cows and the sheep, to carry the lambs and feed the chickens, to toss the hay and to hunt the eggs. It does not cost very much to study God's thoughts in the leaves. To study God's thoughts in the flowers. To hear God's voice in the music of the winds. No somnambulance can so rest the tired brain as the quietude of the woods. That is where God wants us to rest. In the desert place, means near to the great throbbing heart of Mother Nature.

Prevention Better Than Cure

To prove that it will not cost very much to go out for a few days into the quietude of the country and rest a while, I would like to ask you a pertinent question? You have not had a vacation, that is, the kind of a vacation Christ wants you to take, for a long while. How much did you spend in doctor's bills last year? "Well," you answer, "last winter was a hard winter for me. I seemed to be taking cold all the time. My throat was very weak, and each draft would affect it. One week, I was in bed threatened with pneumonia. Another time, I had bronchitis. I was away from the store about ten days. My doctor's bills were very high. I have not paid them all up yet." I would like to ask you another pertinent question. What did your druggist bills amount to last winter? "Oh," you answer, "I was buying medicines all the time. Medicines for my digestion. Medicines for my cough. Medicines for headaches. Tablets for this, and that, and the other thing." Now, my friends, you are ready, I think, to listen to rational advice. You know that one of the great medical tenets states that it is far better to prevent disease, rather than cure the disease after it has come. Old Doctor Samuel D. Gross, the greatest surgical authority of his day, used to say to his students: "Gentlemen, any stupid butcher with a meat-axe can chop off a leg, but it often takes a very great surgeon to save one." Any man can take medicine after he is sick. But it takes a wise man to look far enough ahead to keep his body in such physical trim that he will not get sick. And, my friends, would it not be far better for you as Christian workers to look ahead, and spend the money which you might give to the doctors and the druggists in taking a summer vacation. Would it not be far more economical for you to spend some money in toning up your physical system by taking a rest. Then you can resist the ordinary diseases. Then you will not have to be placed upon an invalid's bed until God says that your work is done. Then you will save money by resting, as well as the precious time which you can ill afford to lose from your next winter's work.

But the greatest of all advantages in going off into a desert place to rest a while, is that we can there come nearer to Christ than we have ever been before. In this age of work, but few men have time to stop and think. Daily tasks become so absorbing, that the second duty crowds itself upon you as soon as the first duty is done. The rushing electric cars whirl the husbands and fathers and brothers to the store. From morning until night the customers have to be seen. Then come the evening tasks. And though "a man works from sun to sun, a woman's work is never done."

But when the Christian goes off into the country to rest, he can go off to pray in the same spirit with which Christ went. When he gets away from the store, the factory, the home, his rested mind will begin to clear. As he saunters out to lie down under the shadows of the trees with his Bible, he will begin to realize how the goodness of God has followed him all the days of his life. He will begin to see in the quietude of the woods that even in his troubles the hand of God has been leading him; that all things work together for good for those who love the Lord. Then, as he sits there in the woods upon the hillside, with the brook gurgling by his side, he will think that he is sitting at Christ's feet, just the same as the disciples of old used to do in the open air. Then he will hear a chirp. When he looks up he will see a little bird swinging upon the tree branches over his head. He will turn and read from Matthew: "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing, and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. Fear ye not, therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows." As the Christian wife walks through the fields and picks the daisies and clover-tops and the goldenrod and the bright yellow buttercups, she will remember the words Jesus spoke when he said that, as he cared for the lilies of the fields, so he would care for her. There is no place on earth where a man can get so close to God as with an open Bible in the quietude of the woods.

A Country Sanctuary

Never was I more impressed with this thought than some years ago, when I visited a humble little country church nestling among the Berkshire Hills. People have often asked me what was the most impressive religious service I ever attended. I have worshiped in the Metropolitan Tabernacle of London and witnessed the marvelous power Charles H. Spurgeon had over his great audience. I have been at the feet of Joseph Parker, the mightiest one-man religious force to-day in all England. I have heard Henry Ward Beecher and often Mr. Moody. I have heard nearly all of the great living preachers this side of the Atlantic and many from beyond the seas. But the most impressive religious service I ever attended was in that little white meeting-house way up among the Berkshire Hills. There were only about thirty-five people present. The little organ was not worth more than ten dollars. The young girl who sat and played the hymns knew but little about music. But for three long hours before I entered that building I had been communing with God in the quietude of the hills. Alone with my Heavenly Father, I saw the setting sun. Alone with my Heavenly Father, I had been living in memory over my past sinful life. Alone with my Heavenly Father, I was telling the Saviour about my troubles. And when I saw the little light of the meeting-house, I was beckoned in. Then the first prayer melted my heart, until the whole room for me was filled with the Holy Spirit. Oh, my brother and sister, I want you to go out into the country not only to get a physical rest, but, like the disciples of old, I want you to take Christ along. In the quietude of the woods, with your open Bible, I want you to keep open a receptive ear, so that your Heavenly Father may talk to you, and by prayer I want you to talk to your Heavenly Father. If you will only do this, you will not only in the country draw nearer to your Heavenly Father, but you will find that Christ, during all the long on-coming winter months, will stay very close to you. I want you to get thoroughly acquainted with Christ. I want you to realize that he is the dearest, the tenderest companion a pardoned sinner could ever have.

Blessing of Recuperation

But there is one other advantage of a summer vacation about which I would speak a few words: That advantage is the desire which comes to all true Christian hearts to get back into the harness to do the work which God has given them to do, after the summer vacation is ended. In the spring, the tired school-teacher is apt to complain. She says to herself, "Why did I ever become a public school-teacher? Many of the mothers only send their children to me because they are too lazy to take care of the children themselves." But after the Christian school-teacher has had a rest in the country with God she begins to realize her opportunities, and she says, "Oh, how good God is to me. Think of the opportunity of usefulness I have. Perhaps by the grace of God I shall not only influence these children, but also the sinful homes from which they come." After the minister has been off alone with Christ to rest awhile, he longs to be back in his pulpit to preach again about the Christ whom he has so learned to love. The mother, the tired mother, after she has had her rest, comes back with a happier heart, a sweeter smile and a gentler prayer. May God pity to-day the men and the women who are so physically exhausted that they think their religious opportunities for doing good are a perpetual burden. By the power of recreating rest may all Christian workers during the coming summer months have their spiritual eyes opened. May they rapturously see that the happiest duty on earth is the opportunity to serve the Lord Jesus Christ.

One morning, the daughter of an English king was found dead, with her head pillowed near an open Bible, and with her finger pointing to the word "Rest." The word "Rest" was found in Matthew 11: 28, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Whether she found the rest she longed for this side of the grave, we cannot know. But with Christ in our hearts, if we accept his sweet invitation, we can find his rest here. May this summer vacation give to all Christian workers rest of heart and soul. May you not only have physical rest but also spiritual rest. May it be the sweet rest with which Christ will fit you for the best work of our earthly life during the coming winter months. Then, in the Fall, may it be God's will to bring the pastor and people of this church together again for his blessed service.

Religion at Our Next World's Fair

ONE of the most unique features of the World's Fair, to be held in St. Louis in 1904, will be the Religious Building and Exhibit. The building will be specially designed, and will have ample space for exhibits by all religious bodies having the Bible as the basis of their organization. No Religious Congress, such as was held at the Columbian Exposition, Chicago, is contemplated; though there may be held special conferences on the part of those denominations that will be grouped together. The Exposition Company provides the building, and the different religious bodies are expected to install their own exhibits.

This religious exhibit feature was not originally contemplated by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company, and it has taken a vast amount of work and influence to effect such an expansion of the original plan as to admit this additional department and secure the necessary appropriation for a building. The movement had its origin in the St. Louis Evangelical Alliance, which, one year ago, appointed a special committee to consider the practicability of a religious exhibit, in connection with the World's Fair. At the all meeting of the Alliance, the Exposition Company was asked to supply a building for "religious purposes, in which facilities shall be provided for holding meetings, hearing lectures, and for the display of such exhibit as the various religious bodies may see fit to make." This petition was signed in behalf of the Evangelical Alliance (which includes twelve different denominations), by the Rev. Dr. R. D. Smart, president, and the Rev. Chas. R. Watson, secretary; for the Catholic Church, by the Rt. Rev. John J. Kain, Archbishop of the Diocese of St. Louis; for the Jews, by the Rev. Dr. Samuel Sale, member of the National Jewish Exhibit Society; for the German Evangelical Church, Revs. Henry Walser and Paul Pfeiffer; for the German Evangelical Lutheran Church, Rev. J. J. Bernthal and Chas. F. Obermeyer; for the International Sunday School Association, Mr. Hobart Brinsmade, president of the Missouri Association; for the Young Men's Christian Association, Mr. George Warren Brown, president of the St. Louis Y. M. C. A.; and for the Unitarian Church, the Rev. Dr. John W. Day.

The next step was the appointment of a General World's Fair Religious Building and Exhibit Committee, composed of one minister and one layman from each religious body, including Baptist, Catholic, Christian, Congregational, Episcopal, Methodist, Methodist Episcopal, South; German Evangelical, German Evangelical Lutheran, Presbyterian, Presbyterian, South; Cumberland Presbyterian, United Presbyterian, English Lutheran, Reformed, International Sunday School Association, Young Men's Christian Association, Jews, and Swedenborgian. This committee organized November 27, 1901, by the election of the Rev. Dr. Samuel J. Nicolls, LL.D., as chairman; vice-chairman, the Rev. Fr. D. S. Phelan, and secretary, the Rev. Samuel I. Lindsay, religious editor St. Louis Republic. These, together with several others, were constituted an executive Committee. This committee met and authorized its officers to press the project before the Exposition Company, with the result above announced. Since the assurance of the separate building has been given, the question of an exhibit has been acted on by a number of general religious bodies, and with favorable results. The outlook, therefore, for a general rallying to this feature of the World's Fair, is all that could be desired.

This will be the first time in the history of Expositions that a feature of this character and magnitude has been attempted. It will also be the first time in the history of Christendom that Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestant, meet in harmony under the same roof, and in a common cause. It is believed that this feature of the World's Fair will be productive of a broader Christian charity than has yet obtained.

From conferences already held, it is inferred that this will be the most unique exhibit of the kind ever made. It is proposed to draw upon all religious depositories throughout the world for its most costly treasures. It is also proposed to present in realistic form, the history and progress of missions, and the growth and development of religious educational work. It is further proposed to reproduce in miniature the most sacred symbols of religious thought and life, extending into the remote past, and covering the present. In a word, it is proposed to embody in this exhibit the best of religious thought and effort, growing out of a faith which has its basis in the Word of God, which liveth and abideth forever.

A TRIBUTE IN VERSE

I find THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a book of inspiration,
A paper that should have a place with every tribe and nation;
Its sermons and its teachings are magnificent and grand,
You will find upon its pages a synopsis of all ages,
And just the information the world should understand.

THE GOSPEL IN PICTURES

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUG. 3
EXODUS 40: 1-13

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- "ENTER INTO HIS GATES WITH THANKSGIVING, AND INTO HIS COURTS WITH PRAISE." PSALM 100: 4

It is too much forgotten that God gave at Sinai not only the law, but also the Gospel—the law carved in stone, the Gospel pictured in the gold, and blue, and scarlet of the Tabernacle. It was a kindergarten Gospel, expressed in colors and motions for a newly emancipated race of slaves, who were appropriately called "the children of Israel," for they were indeed grown-up children. They needed to be taught, as children are taught to-day, in kindergartens, and in the best homes, where unseen things are likened to things seen, and the unknown is reached through the known. Only two months had the Israelites been freedmen, and few of them, probably, could have read words, and fewer still could have thought out a theology. But they were able to receive at least some dim ideas of religion by the help of symbols.

The interpretation of the Tabernacle is not left to our human fancy. As one goes through an art gallery confidently, if he has the official catalogue in hand, so we have no room to doubt what the Tabernacle means, for we have an inspired guide-book in the Epistle to the Hebrews and other Scriptures. The Tabernacle and all its parts, its furniture, and priesthood, and sacrifices, point to the work of Christ, both objective and subjective, his work for us and in us. He is at once the "true Tabernacle," the High Priest and the sacrifice.

The Tabernacle, as a whole, pictures incarnation, the coming of Christ to be a man with men, as the first chapter of John's Gospel reminds us: "The Word was made flesh and tented among us." Look down from Sinai's cliffs upon the almost numberless tents of Israel, and there in the centre is a separated tent, larger and yet small, whose exterior appearance is as rough as any, representing Christ made like unto his brethren in his real humanity.

The golden interior of that tent symbolizes the divinity hidden in Christ's humanity, which was uncovered on the Mount of Transfiguration, when John and others beheld his glory. The only visible sign of divineness in the exterior view of the Tabernacle, was the pillar of fire and cloud that hovered above it.

Christ tenting with us! What a picture of divine fellowship and friendship is that! In the month of August many a man tastes the delight of being in camp with some man of distinction, who has laid by his robes of state, and, in child-like informality, is mingling with his camp associates in hunting, and fishing, and veranda banterings. So Christ comes near us as one of our camping party in the journey of life, as we "daily pitch our moving tents a day's march nearer home."

A church building is but the Tabernacle turned to boards or brick, and should still picture Christ among men, as it stands among the homes of the congregation. Alas, that any one should let his affection stop at the church, which is but the guide-board pointing to fellowship with Christ. As well might one eat the invitation to a dinner, instead of enjoying the fellowship to which it invites.

Entering the Tabernacle court, the first thing seen is the brazen altar, which pictures the Cross. Beside the altar stands the High Priest, at certain times, in spotless robes of white, and offers an animal, whole and perfect, which is subsequently slain; all of which pictures Christ as our sinless Mediator, offering himself a perfect sacrifice. The High Priest was required first to offer for himself, and then continually for the people; but Christ needs no atonement for himself, and his offering of himself was so perfect as to make priesthood and sacrifices forever unnecessary after he said, "It is finished."

That Tabernacle altar, ever gory with the blood of offerings, proclaimed impressively to the "children of Israel:" 1. That sin is "exceedingly sinful;" 2. That "the wages of sin is death;" 3. That God provides a substitute. Besides the slain sacrifice yet another animal, the scapegoat, was needed to picture the effect of the Cross in removing the guilt of those who accept its offered atonement. On the head of the scapegoat the High Priest laid his hands, so laying upon it the sins of the penitent, and then sent it forth into the wilderness to picture the great truth, that through the Cross the guilt of our sin is "taken away," removed "as far as the East is from the West." The altar, as a part of the life of Christ, in us stands for the spirit of self-sacrifice, that displaces selfishness when the mind of Christ is imparted.

What, then, is the significance of the laver of pure water, the second piece of furniture encountered as we enter the Tabernacle court? The brazen altar having pictured forgiveness, the taking away of the guilt of sin—what theologians call justification, a work Christ does for us—the laver represents the work he does in us in regeneration or conversion, washing away the very love of sin, developing a clean life, not of deed and word only, but in our innermost preferences, "bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience that is in Christ." In the altar we see Christ as the substitute; in the laver as the Purifier—"the purest among the mighty, and the mightiest among the pure," who is able to make us also pure, lavers in which his pure spirit shall dwell. Imagine Christ holding in his pure hands, or gazing upon with his pure eyes, the books and pictures that some of us have fondly seen and handled! Imagine his pure lips telling some of the foul stories and jests to which we have listened without protest, or perhaps have ourselves spoken—words, that if spoken in our childhood, would have led our pure mothers to wash our mouths with soap and water. We are coming next to a symbol of strength—a boy's ambition—and let it be remembered that purity is closely related to strength, as Tennyson's knight suggests:

My strength is as the strength of ten,
Because my heart is pure.

In the holy place of the Tabernacle itself we find the table of shewbread, whose meaning is the same as those words of Christ, "I am the true bread that came down from heaven." The Psalmist had a similar thought in mind when he said, "The Lord is my strength and song." The Christian, if he is to be truly Christlike, must be not only clean lamp. And the shining lamps must also mean that our religion, if real, will be joyous—"sweetness and light." There are some "sweet sinners" who put to shame some "sour saints." A genuine Christian life, with its memories of pardon, and its hopes of heaven, must be glad. Gloom in a professed Christian is a sign he is not in possession. Oil is all through the Bible a sign of the Holy Spirit. If our lives are lamps filled with that Spirit, we can not but shine. Those foolish virgins, representing unspiritual Christians whose lamps had gone out, found that empty lamps of religious formality were not passports to heaven.

There was also in the holy place, near the inner veil, an altar of incense, picturing the prayerfulness of Christ and of the Christian. This is a time when prayer is somewhat dimmed in many hearts, because science has shown in what orderly wisdom God conducts the world. This may well make us hesitate to pray for changes in the course of nature to suit our selfish interests; but as law does not keep a child from appealing to his father's heart, no more should it keep us from appealing to God for wisdom, and love, and pardon, and purity, and strength for useful service. Sweet as incense, God tells us, are the prayers of his children. The Talmud legend of Sandalphon, the angel of prayer, set to poetry by Longfellow, tells

How he gathers the prayers as he stands,
And they turn into flowers in his hands.

And the Bible speaks of golden vials, full of odors, which are the prayers of the saints. But the very incense that pictured the sweetness of heartfelt prayer, has become a lazy substitute for prayer. A child hearing the Lord's prayer spoken by a phonographic doll, said, "I don't think God likes such dolls and such prayers." Nor does he like heartless prayers, even from living lips, which sometimes are as machine-like as a phonograph prayer. And prayers in song should also have a soul in them, else their incense will fall instead of rising heavenward. No one should ever sing what he does not feel. To hire a singer to pray and praise in song, whose life is not in tune with Christ, is hardly better than hiring some one to swear.

The most holy place, the Bible tells us, stands for heaven itself, into which, through the rent veil of his crucified flesh, Christ has entered for us as our Advocate and Intercessor, asking pardon for us through his own blood sprinkled on the mercy seat, which pictures the very throne of God—in it the law, and yet it is the place of mercy, which is like the imperishable manna it contained, while the budding rod of Aaron pictures the rod of justice budding into love.

When Jesus died on the Cross, the thick quilted veil to the most holy place was rent, signifying that by the rent veil of his crucified flesh a way of direct access to God for every soul had been opened. "I go to prepare a place for you," said Jesus, and entering by the way of the Cross, we ourselves shall sit beside the throne with seraphim and cherubim of wisdom and love, knowing one joy that even they cannot know, the sweetness of mercy, heavenly as the manna from heaven, beautiful as the flowers on the rod of justice, the golden crown of the law itself.

Lord William Russell, winding up his watch the last time on the eve of his execution, said: "There, I have done with time; now eternity comes."

THE "NIGHT-BELL" OF PRAYER. "Pull the night-bell." This is the inscription we often see written on the doorpost of the shop in which medicines are sold. Some of us have had our experience with night-bells, when sudden illness has overtaken some member of our households, or when the sick have rapidly grown worse. How have we hurried through the silent streets, when only here and there a light glimmered from some chamber window! How eagerly have we pulled the night-bell at our physician's door; and then, with prescription in hand, have sounded the alarm at the place where the remedy was to be procured. Those of us who have had these lonely midnight walks and have given the summons for quick relief, know the meaning of that Bible-text, "Arise! cry out in the night!"

PREPARING THE ARK AND THE ALTARS FOR THE FURNISHING OF THE TABERNACLE

but strong, and as bread makes the body strong, so the written and living Word, received like food into the soul, makes it strong to do and bear. Even of human leaders and friends we say, "He came into my life like an influence," meaning that his example, his words, and his spirit ennobled ours. But in a deeper sense Christ enters the hearts that open to him. He said: "Except ye eat my flesh and drink my blood, there is no life in you." We can never truly live, till Christ lives in us in that self-sacrificing spirit which is pictured by the symbols of his broken body and blood. "He that saveth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for Christ's sake shall find it."

This is with young men an athletic age. They almost worship the swiftest and strongest of their fellows. Even in the colleges there is need to kindle a like ambition for mental strength, and in the churches for spiritual strength. To endure through a six days' bicycle race is really more folly than glory, but to endure through the temptations a young man has to meet in a week's time in these days, and come out unscathed, that is a display of strength worth making.

Opposite the shewbread stood the seven-branched candlestick, picturing the outshining influence for good, first of Christ, but also of all in whom he dwells, who is himself the Light of the world. The seven lamps may well remind us to shine not alone on the Lord's Day, but on all the seven days. "Let your light so shine that others may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Whatever more it means, the candlestick means we should let our Christianity shine out in Christian deeds, in good works. We have not made too much of the altar, but we have too much belittled good works, fearing they will be substituted for faith. But they must supplement faith or it is a dead

Our Golden Opportunity in the Philippines

SINCE my return from the Philippines, it has been my privilege to speak to many audiences concerning affairs in that country, and as to the need of hastening and sending the printed Gospel to those people, who are now so eagerly asking us for it. A letter recently received from one of the thousand public school-teachers, who went out at the call of our government, describes the people as eager to acquire the English language. After seven months' study, several Filipino students from one station have been sent to another town to teach English. This certainly looks as if Filipinos are not mentally slow. A few of these students, in a Philippine province, paid a social visit to their American teacher, saying, "We are most happy, senora, in having you come to us from America. We prize the knowledge you bring us beyond our power to express; but one thing more is needed, and that is that you should explain to us the Bible. For the first time in our history, we can freely read God's Word. Why do you not have one class each day to study the sacred Book?"

Then the reluctant teacher was obliged to explain that our government had not sent her to teach them the Bible, and therefore she could not have the class they desired.

"You tell us the United States have sent us a thousand teachers, for general knowledge," they urged. "Why will they not send us also teachers to explain the Bible?"

"Oh, the people in the United States did not believe you wanted such teachers. They have thought you are all Roman Catholics, and would not read the Bible."

"Senora, please send them word it is a great mistake. We are, or have been, Roman Catholics, because we have known no other way to worship God. We now wish to become Protestants. We want teachers to lead us. Please send the American people word, that we shall all read the Bible, and become Protestants, if they will send us Bible teachers."

Perhaps, however, the reader, like many I met on my journey across the continent, may say: What a hopeless undertaking, to try to do anything with such treacherous, filthy, and unchaste people! No, it is useless. The Filipino is too idle, too filthy. Better let him alone. Leave him to settle his own fate." My reply is: "I have waited for some time among heathen people. Without exception, the features you consider so hopeless in the Filipino, are the universal characteristics of all heathen." The Romish church has had the opportunity for the last 300 years of elevating and Christianizing the people of the Philippines; the masses, however, present only the usual characteristics of all heathen. Would it not indeed be the most wonderful miracle the world has ever seen, if, by simply raising the American flag these people should suddenly become transformed?

We must give these people the Bible, and also evangelists to expound it to them. The door so wide open now, is not likely to continue to be open long. The Roman Church has at last concluded to remove the friars, and will put in their places young American priests. Simply because a thing is American it is sure to be immensely popular in the Philippines. Unless, meanwhile, American Protestant Christians give these people opportunity of intelligently choosing the truth, the most natural result will be that the Filipino will return to the church of Rome. Let us send evangelists and missionaries by the hundreds, now! It is the golden moment!

The Battle of the Priests and Friars

A short time ago a young friar was arrested in Bacolod, on the charge of striking a young girl, and bound over to await the action of the Court of First Instance. The circumstances of the case, as alleged by the enemies of the friars, are, that while walking the street, the priest met a muchacha, or young girl of the lower class, and asked her why she did not kiss his hand. She replied that she "did not have to."

"You used to do so," said the priest. "But I don't have to do it in these days," averred the girl, pluckily.

On coming within the outer door of the house, the friar asked again, "Will you kiss my hand now?" and upon the girl persisting in her refusal, he struck her in the face. Such, in substance, is the story of the witnesses against the priest. The mother of the girl, however, denies the story.

The religious leaders of the anti-Friar party are the native clergy, called padres. The friars look with a sort of contempt upon the padres. The padres hate the friars. The friars consider the native clergy as inferior to themselves, and incapable of filling the higher places in the Church. The padres covet the high clerical positions, which have been withheld from them, regarding the friars as Spaniards and foreigners, usurping places which of right belong to the natives.

The great land owners are the Dominicans, the Augustinians and the Recolotes, the two former being by far the largest real estate proprietors. The Dominicans possess immense tracts of great value in the Island of Luzon. The entire holdings by the ecclesiastical corporations, however, amount to much less than the popular estimate, the aggregate being 452,000 acres. This does not include their city property, which is of great value, especially in the city of Manila, where the value has been greatly enhanced through the American occupation.

Recently a popular entertainment was given for the benefit of the Rizal monument fund, which was well attended, and from which a liberal amount was raised for the monument. The Filipinos greatly enjoy anything that partakes of the nature of a fiesta, and the entertainment was well attended and greatly enjoyed. Several Americans participated in the exercises by singing, there being an unusual number of teachers present in attendance on the Teachers' Institute. The native audience were particularly pleased with the singing by a young American girl.

I recently visited the hacienda of Senor Juan Araneta, a Filipino, who owns an estate of several thousand acres, situated at the base of the mountains. Senor Araneta is one of the most progressive and energetic Filipinos I have ever met. During the troublesome days of the revolution, Araneta was a power in the land. I have heard that he asked his laborers who among them would volunteer to fight the Spaniards. Most of them offered to go, but some hung back and muttered something about their families. Three or four were lined up and shot as an "example" to the others, who were then more than willing to fight the Spaniards!

Answered Prayers

L. B. M., Byron Centre, Mich., writes: One year ago we were greatly wronged. I prayed that this wrong might be righted. My prayer has been answered.

H., Brussels, Ont., Can., writes:

I was in great danger of losing something which I treasured much. I prayed for its safety. My prayer was answered.

H. O. W., Louisville, Ky., writes:

I was troubled regarding my lack of strength and daily work. I prayed unto the Lord and he gave me strength and lightened my load. I am in need of wisdom and ability to perform certain duties. I asked of the Lord and he gave unto me.

O. A. H., Alleghany, Calif., writes:

I prayed God for one of the greatest blessings that can come in a person's life, when it seemed impossible, except by a miracle. God performed that wonder, which seemed almost a miracle, and granted the blessing, sooner, than I could expect, and he performed a second great blessing in connection with the first, and in answer to prayer. He has been very good to me in many ways, and blessed me and mine exceedingly.

Mrs. G., Mountain Home, Va., writes:

I prayed earnestly to my Heavenly Father that he might deliver a dear friend of mine who was in danger. God heard and answered.
